A Dispatch for the Admiral.

BY WILSON MITCHELL.

It was during the Red River expedition, and the Quark, the smallest gun boat of the fleet, was lying at anchor and waiting for the other boats and transports, lay between the low shores, wrapped in darkness.

The country was most peculiar—indeed, "country" is but a makeshift word to apply to this conglomeration of land and water. The levees along the Mississippi had been neglected during the war; they had overflowed in many places and the low countries had been inundated. In addition, the Red River had been of unprecedented height, and the result was an immense stretch of territory, completely submerged, with everywhere small islands covered with trees, shrubs and bushes, and great forests rising above the waters, with a hundred sinuous waterways branching off from the main stream leading only to white lagoons covering what had been fertile fields waving with grain the very day before.

It was night; the Quark had anchored in wilderness and not a light could be seen on her to make a target for any lurking boat that might be watching and waiting in the swamps close at hand.

There were some such boats, the Quark had, and efficient machines. All during their progress that day a steady gill-net had accompanied them from the shores on either hand and more than one gallant tar was waving a wounded limb to attest the almost unerring accuracy of the gun-like sharpshooters who found the way.

A young man of eighteen in the uniform of an ensign of the navy stood before the captain in the dim light of that obscure cabin. He was a good looking, nearly young fellow, and as he listened to his superior's words he stood rigid and immovable as stone.

"It is vital that this dispatch reach the admiral," the commander was saying. "I select you, Blake, to carry it, because you have already proved in more than one instance your courage and your fertility of resource."

"I send you in the night, because it is hardly necessary to explain, your life would be worthless amongst these deadly swamp-shooters in the darkness. The canoe that was picked up this morning is on deck. Take that and—"

"The commander was here, "good luck to you."

Probably the commander would have wished the boy a happier good by, but for the fact that displays of emotion were hardly the thing for men in his position.

He handed the dispatch to the young man and shook him by the hand. At least that pressure did not lack warmth. The young sailor and then turned to go. But he hesitated.

"One thing, captain," he said.

"Well?"

"It is possible that I might be captured."

"What, then, sir?" the captain asked a little sharply.

"In that case the dispatch should be destroyed."

"Assuredly. If its contents were read by the enemy the result might be disastrous."

Blake reflected for a moment.

"Can you not give me another dispatch—a dummy? You will put into it anything or nothing—anything but the information conveyed in this one. It might in a pinch at least gain time for me."

The commander thought for an instant, and then, without a word, sat down and penned a message to the admiral. This duty made, he handed it to Blake, saying:

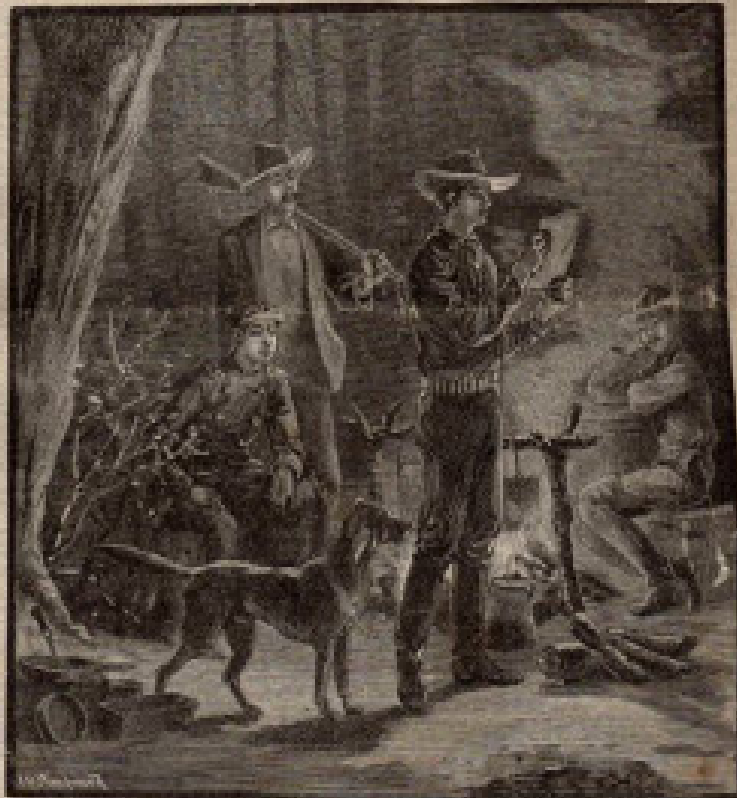

"There! the rascals are free to read that and make the most of it."

"Thank you!" said Blake. Then he saluted and retired.

an unusually smart guesser, I'd vote, to fight on that paper."

Blake had spread through the ship the message was selected on a special wireman, in those watery wastes, and amid the blackness of the night about and over came crowding and to shake him by the hand and tell him God al!

Alas! the gallantry of him on death was quick

"WELL, WORTHY THIS WAS! A DISPATCH."

Going forward to the ward room he released the services of the youngest sailorman on the ship. The next, under Blake's direction, opened the sleeve of his jacket at the shoulder seam. The original dispatch was folded into small compass and inserted within the padding and under the gilt striped shoulder strap; then the sleeve was quickly sewed up again.

Blake pressed his finger into the cloth and pushed the dispatch in every point.

"A good job," was his comment. "It will take dark and only the best of cat-like sailors could have found their way so silently and so surely to the belt-works."

"Ready, sir," whispered the boatswain. "I had a few bits of black put into the water for you."

Blake thanked the man, whispered a general good by and swung himself over the side and down the companion ladder.

At length the waters lapped his feet, and it was only the faint light of the stars that enabled him to make out a dimly dark object floating alongside

MR. LOWRY CAME TO THE DOOR OF THE FAIR AS THEY DINED AND LISTENED COINCIDENTS ABOUT "THE COUNTY FAIR."

The County Fair.

BY JOHN HARRISON.

"M.A." said Sam Lowry at breakfast, "when are we going to the fair?"

Mr. Lowry, senior, was vigorously occupying a breakfast table at Sam's elbow, but it was not he to whom that momentous question was usually referred.

"Fair? What fair?" demanded Mrs. Lowry with an air that said as plain as could be that such trivial questions as these were altogether too unimportant to attract her notice.

"Why, what if you didn't know! I mean the county fair at Headbourn, of course. It opens to-day. They say it's going to be a big thing. They're going to have horse racing."

"For the land's sake! Horse racing, eh? Now,

I call that a pretty thing to set before the youth of the land, leading to betting and gambling and worse."

"Well, there's the fancy work and essay contest show. Everybody—"

"Hamp! And they are supposed to give prizes for that sort of thing. I reckon, just as they did when I was a girl and lived over in Lonsome County. Every year we used to work a sampler, just as far back as I can remember; and how many prizes do you think she got? Not one! I know 'em."

"Well, there's the cake and pie exhibit." Sam made haste to get in, for his mother was a great hand at such things, and would not allow that she had a close competitor in the whole village.

"Don't you mention such things before me," exclaimed Mrs. Lowry with some asperity. "You recollect, father, that fancy cake I sent to the fair when we were keeping company. It was all covered with the most beautiful frosting in a diamond shaped oblong pattern, with the angel Gabriel made out of white sugar standing in the middle, blowing a gold horn—made of all paper, and just too cute for anything."

"Yes, I remember it, I'm sure, but it wasn't up to what you can do now."

"You loved it was the silliest thing you ever ate, and so did everybody else. And what do they do? Give the prize to a little child nine years old?"

Whereat Mrs. Lowry sits back and looks around as if she were calling upon the world at large to witness the absurdity.

"Well, then, there's a—oh, baby show!" cries Sam in a heroic effort to find something that will suit.

"Baby show? Bah!" No, this was too much.

CHAPTER I.

A STRANGER COMES TO TOWN.

THE winds were making a night of it on the river and along towards morning they whirled their last madblows back on a shrouded lumber pile of canal boats that was crawling steadily down towards New York City. A heavier partial and the Mary Emma, the tall center of the tow, was blown ashore at Rensselaer.

Just before dawn a white wind and middle aged man, with long, shaggy hair and a full beard, walked into the Travelers' Hotel by the railway station. He announced that he had been a passenger on the stranded Mary Emma, and registered as "J. H. Brown, Port Haven, Michigan."

Mr. Brown hesitated about this after depositing his two heavy bags with the hotel clerk. Then he studied down to the street where, the tide being low, the Mary Emma now lay high and dry. Finding that there was no answering when he could return to his quarters, he decided to take a walk through the town.

Naturally Mr. Brown went his way up Market Street.

It is a steep climb up Market Street, and when Mr. Brown arrived at its intersection with Broad he was probably a little "tired," for he stopped and leaned against the frame of a corner dwelling house.

For some inexplicable reason his attention seemed to be attracted by a small, plain, black building of one story on the corner diagonally opposite. Certainly there was nothing worthy of note about the dilapidated structure, nothing to attract one's notice even—except, perhaps, the tarnished gold letters on the sign surmounting the roof.

CORLAND COUNTY BANK.

Nevertheless Mr. Brown came his eye quickly all over the building with that swift but critical glance with which a keen judge of house work is wont to take in the points of a matter at the speed of light.

There is a covered wagon standing in front of the door with the driver, a country-looking fellow, leaning on the seat. Suddenly the back door opened and two men came out bearing between them a chest with iron handles.

The driver in white apron is an instant at the two men lift the chest into the rear end of his vehicle. Then one stands guard while the other alikes, for the first thing that catches Mr. Brown's eye as he approaches this dingy little shop, is a brown paper bulletin posted on its windows.

GREAT SACRIFICE. SELLING OUT BELOW COST.

This little shop window is very dirty, the notices displayed in it are stained and time worn and the proprietor, a dejected, hopeless-looking mortal, sits smoking his pipe in the very doorway, completely barring the entrance, as if there was not the slightest possible chance of anybody having the least desire to pass in.

Even when he sees a stranger step and cross the street, he does not move.

"Good morning, friend," greets Mr. Brown. "This is a mighty story for a man of my poor word to read. You don't want to fall down as your expression, do you?"

"Want to do me no harm, a it don't do me no good."

"That's a perfectly complimentary to me, but I'm," laughed Mr. Brown, "but you can't always tell, or—"

"The stranger was looking up over the doorway. 'I don't see your sign with your name on.'"

"No, there ain't none. What's the use?"

"Selling off, I see," observed Mr. Brown sympathetically. "That's poor, ah—"

"What can you expect? Who wouldn't have at housewife's wares? I ain't a first-class housewife!"

"If he ain't you speaking off?"

"The man what owns the house?"

"And who is he?" persisted Mr. Brown.

The storekeeper pointed with the stem of his pipe towards the house on the opposite corner where his acquaintance had been sitting a few minutes previous. Glancing that way, Mr. Brown saw a handsome, dignified gentleman sweeping down the doorway.

He is plainly but well dressed; his cap and side whiskers show well yet business, marked only by a slight expression of care upon his countenance. He crosses Broad Street towards the two floors and then comes over towards the bank, passing in front of it and out of view.

THE LADY HAD TAKEN THE REINS FROM THE COACHMAN'S HANDS AND WAS TRYING AT THEM WITH ALL THE SKILL OF HER HAND.

remains near the back to rearrange a moment later both weighed down with carious bags.

Mr. Brown leaves the chair of state as these are thrown into the covered wagon and runs two more establishments brought out and deposited therein, before it drives off through the deserted upper section of Market Street.

Following the wagon with his eye, Mr. Brown now observes a small frame house behind and adjoining the bank. That institution standing at the head of upper Market Street seemed to look down its windowed way and say: "Let all business stop here!"

Yet the little house behind it is an deserted Market Street has a queer front: it is the only structure that has had the temerity to defy the congested far of the bank. The retreating would seem to have told him so, but he seemed not to have any one else to tell, and to have the only of the property."

"If he ain't you speaking off?"

"The man what owns the house?"

"And who is he?" persisted Mr. Brown.

The storekeeper pointed with the stem of his pipe towards the house on the opposite corner where his acquaintance had been sitting a few minutes previous. Glancing that way, Mr. Brown saw a handsome, dignified gentleman sweeping down the doorway.

CHAPTER I.

SCENE AND SETTING.

MR. CAMPBELL THORNE sat in his private office, the two large windows of which looked out upon some of the loveliest of the Francisco streets. Before him on the open desk was a pile of several letters, and to his hand he held one he had just opened.

Mr. Thorne was tall and handsomely built, with hair that, turning gray, and a slight crease in his narrow forehead. His beard was cut in approved English style and his eyes smooth shaven.

He would have been a good looking man had it not been for the fact that his eyes were small and set very near together. These eyes gave him a shy, fidgety-like look, not at all pleasing.

He was dressed as befitting his position—that of a well-to-do banker—and the furniture of the private office, as well as that of the outer apartment, was in keeping with the distinguished standing of the firm of Thorne & Langdon. Mr. Langdon was a figure in the house, except in the matter of control. He left his partner in full control, and Mr. Thorne's main trouble with him was to get him to do his duty.

There was a marked smile on the banker's face as, after reading the letter in his hand for the second time, he laid it down and reached a left hand to his desk. A clerk from the outer office answered the summons.

"Send Noel here at once," commanded Mr. Thorne in the thin, raspy voice so natural to him.

He sat tapping the desk impatiently, waiting for the person he had summoned. He came in a few moments, a fine looking, broad shouldered youth of eighteen, with hair gray even and alert bearing.

"Did you wish to see me, sir?" he asked respectfully.

"I shouldn't have sent for you if I hadn't," responded Mr. Thorne sharply. "I want you to go to Grayson's again. You know where he lives?"

"Yes, sir—on Minger Street—not a very respectable place either for a man of his wealth," replied the young fellow, smiling.

"He probably knows his own business best," was the rejoinder. "Well, he wishes to send an six thousand dollars for a special broadcast, and you must get it. Give him a receipt for it, and send you, don't delay on the way."

"Yes, sir," and the other turned to go. Mr. Thorne, however, detained him a moment.

"By the way, Noel," he said, "have you seen Carl this morning?"

The young fellow flushed a little.

"No, sir," he said truthfully.

"Where was he last evening? Do you know?"

"He was out, I think," was the doubtful reply.

"Doesn't come with some of those speedy demands of his, I have no doubt. Isn't that so?"

Noel remained silent and Mr. Thorne went on without waiting for a reply.

"That boy will drive me to distraction, I believe," he said. "His mother has indulged him and he has become a perfect young rascal, and now that he is too old for her to manage, he is turned over to me. I'm sure I don't know what to do with him. I declare I'll send him away to school again and see if that won't do some good."

Then he looked up and saw his nephew still standing respectfully by. "What are you waiting for?" he demanded. "Go along and do that errand I gave you. Let me tell you, young man, you can't keep 'round here."

But Noel departed, closing the door in the midst of the clerk's speech. He seized his hat, along a street waiter walked over his shoulder by the strap attached, and left the office.

Noel's mother had died when he was a babe and his father had been very dear to him indeed. Added to the misfortune of his death was the discovery that he had been actually a poor man. Had speculation had swept away nearly all the property.

Noel had been preparing for college but then, of course, matters were impossible. Campbell Thorne, the judge's half brother, was executor of the estate, and after settling with the creditors there was really less than two hundred dollars left. The Storm Visitor.

By HENRY HODGENFIELD.

ON the borders of the wild forest that clothes the Thuringer Wald and on the road between Gerba and Hohenbach, the lonely traveler never failed to check his horse in astonishment as suddenly meeting upon the little garden spot in the midst of which stood the picturesque-looking box of Count Rudolph von Hohenbach.

It was so quiet and calm and calm in the midst of the dark, wild forest that it was a ghastly sight to him who had started of the rough way and tried of the grand but lonely borders of the mountain wastes.

If the little park was kept in such excellent order, it was due to the unerring care of Carl Fritz, the game-keeper of Count Rudolph, who, with his wife and two little ones, inhabited a wing of the thatched villa.

It was a lovely life, most of the year the only society was that of an occasional traveler who asked for a lodging chamber a month or two before the season closed with the appearance of the snow, and then he remained upon the place in great numbers for a long winter night.

It was now the middle of January, and the owner and his merry friends had departed a month or more before. It had snowed a little the night previous and during the day the sun had come out for a brief instant, only to disappear in a heavy cloud as the clouds again became heavy and lowering.

Carl, when dressing up of the forest a little before daylight with a bundle of faggots over his shoulder, and Hohenbach, the staid old man, at his heels.

"A bad night for two who may be on the road," said Carl, as he threw the faggots on the kitchen floor.

"But it seemed to be clearing when I looked out an hour ago," protested Frau Fritz.

"Two hours ago," corrected Carl. "Time has when the good wife would say so. Listen! The trees are crying out to the cold wind that sweeps down the mountain. There will be more again, and plenty."

"The snow is a real blanket!"

"For the dead. But come! we must make the fire for tonight, and—"

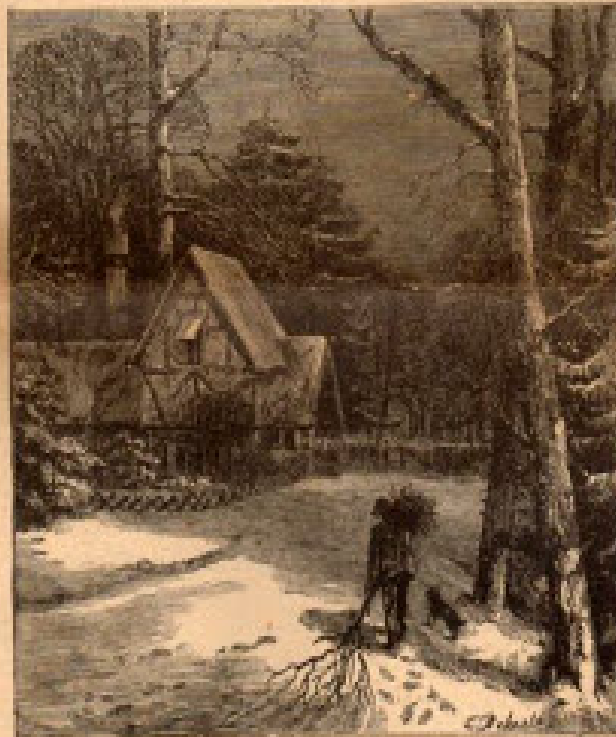

"Look! It moves again," cried Fritz Charlotte.

"Did I not tell you?" said Carl, going to the window. "The angels are shaking their feet, little ones. Tomorrow, at best, it's a traveler, with. He is in there. He is ready!" He looks the gate! I do not like that. He is ready!" but a lightning bolt had galloped up from the direction of Hohenbach, and, without waiting for any one to appear, he had tried to have galloped over the gate.

He had dismounted and was chattering at the door before Carl had time to open it.

"Rough! I do not like your weather," said the stranger, entering without ceremony and going straight to the fire.

Carl and his wife stared at him in astonishment at this announcement, and the two little children ran to meet to hide behind their mother's skirts. For the traveler was a large-looking fellow, with his piercing eyes, his long, dark beard, and mustache, and his tall figure, which carried itself with a certain air of bravado.

CARL CARES THINGING OUT OF THE FOREST A LITTLE BEFORE MIDNIGHT.

At his rude speculation about the weather, Carl bowed in spite of the intelligent flash in his eye, and said:

"We would ask nothing better than to change it for your convenience."

"But ha! You are generous, my friend."

"But the weather," continued Carl politely, "like this house, is not open to us as we will."

"And where lies it?"

"The Herr Count Rudolph of Hohenbach's," answered simple Carl, a little proudly, as if it be his duty to maintain the dignity of his absent master.

"I thought I could not be mistaken," said the stranger. "And you are?"

"Carl Fritz, the count's gamekeeper." "I need not have asked. And this is the good Fritz Fritz, of whom I have heard such praise."

"Honored!" exclaimed the shouting wife, carrying, while Carl looked puzzled.

"You did not expect me?" asked the stranger.

"But here—"

"The count said—I may have misinterpreted him—that he had sent you a letter by a traveler who would pass this way last week."

"No traveler has passed this way days."

"No matter! He may have taken the last batch of forest faggots, the only one, for all I know—"

"But to the point! You do not know him, then? I am Gustav Riedlin, the count's steward."

"Yes, the count's steward! But Master Hohenbach is he dead, then?"

"No, he took a better place."

"There could not be a better place than with the Count Rudolph," exclaimed Carl.

"The count is not the richest man in the world," replied the other, who was crossing himself at his own statement. "Then he is dead?"

"No, he took a better place."

CHAPTER I.

SCENE AND SETTING.

MR. CAMPBELL THORNE sat in his private office, the two large windows of which looked out upon some of the loveliest of the Francisco streets. Before him on the open desk was a pile of several letters, and to his hand he held one he had just opened.

Mr. Thorne was tall and handsomely built, with hair fast turning gray, and a slight stoop in his narrow shoulders. His beard was cut in approved English style and his eyes smooth shaven.

He would have been a good looking man had it not been for the fact that his eyes were small and set very near together. These eyes gave him a shy, fidgety-like look, not at all pleasant.

He was dressed as befitting his position—that of a well-to-do banker—and the furniture of the private office, as well as that of the outer apartment, was in keeping with the distinguished standing of the firm of Thorne & Langdon. Mr. Langdon was a figure in the house, except in the matter of control. He left his partner in full control, and Mr. Thorne's high station of mind and clearness of vision fully warranted him in so doing.

There was a marked smile on the banker's face as, after reading the letter in his hand for the second time, he laid it down and reached a left hand to his desk. A clerk from the outer office answered the summons.

"Send Noel here at once," commanded Mr. Thorne in the thin, raspy voice so natural to him.

He sat tapping the desk impatiently, waiting for the person he had summoned. He came in a few moments, a fine looking, broad shouldered youth of eighteen, with keen gray eyes and alert bearing.

"Did you wish to see me, sir?" he asked respectfully.

"I shouldn't have sent for you if I hadn't," responded Mr. Thorne sharply. "I want you to go to Grayson's again. You know where he lives?"

"Yes, sir—on Stinger Street—not a very respectable place either for a man of his wealth," replied the young fellow, smiling.

"He probably knows his own business best," was the rejoinder. "Well, he wishes to send an six thousand dollars for a special broadcast, and you must get it. Give him a receipt for it, and mind you, don't delay on the way."

"Yes, sir," and the other turned to go. Mr. Thorne, however, detained him a moment.

"By the way, Noel," he said, "have you seen Carl this morning?"

The young fellow flushed a little.

"No, sir," he said truthfully.

"Where was he last evening? Do you know?"

"He was out, I think," was the doubtful reply.

"Doesn't come with some of those speedy demands of his, I have no doubt. Isn't that so?"

Noel remained silent and Mr. Thorne went on without waiting for a reply.

"That boy will drive me to distraction, I believe," he said. "His mother has indulged him and he has become a perfect young rascal, and now that he is too old for her to manage, he is turned over to me. I'm sure I don't know what to do with him. I declare I'll send him away to school again and see if that won't do some good."

Then he looked up and saw his nephew still standing respectfully by. "What are you waiting for?" he demanded. "Go along and do that errand I gave you. Let me tell you, young man, you can't keep 'round here."

But Noel departed, closing the door in the midst of the clerk's speech. He seized his hat, along a street waiter rushed over his shoulder by the strap attached, and left the office.

Noel's mother had died when he was a babe and his father had been very dear to him indeed. Added to the misfortune of his death was the discovery that he had been actually a poor man. Had speculation had swept away nearly all the property.

Noel had been preparing for college but then, of course, matters were impossible. Campbell Thorne, the judge's half brother, was executor of the estate, and after settling with the creditors there was really less than two hundred dollars left. He had, however, taken Noel into his own family and given him a position in the banking house. Here, as under dark in the bank, and made of all work about

THE CHIEFMAN WAS RUNNING FOR HIS LIFE. A BAILOR HUNG ON TO HIS TAIL.

He had become used to his uncle's harshness in the six months he had been an inmate of his house and an employee at the office of Thorne & Langdon.

Until six months before Noel Thorne had lived with his father, Judge Thorne, in Oakland, the aristocratic suburb of San Francisco. The judge had been reputed wealthy and had held a high position in the judicial circles of the State. Some months previous to his death, however, he had become broken in health and after a lingering illness died, leaving his only child, Noel, alone in the world.

His uncle's place, Judge Thorne's son felt his reduced circumstances keenly.

His uncle's family was small, consisting of himself and wife and one child, a boy about Noel's age, named Carl. But the five villa, the Thornes occupied out near the Cliff House, was surrounded by grounds, to keep these in order occupied about all Noel's spare time before and after twasting hours. For three duties he received, his board and clothes and a small sum weekly.

Carl Thorne was rather a short, stunted boy with hair inclined to an Auburn tint like his mother's, and eyes set near together like his father's. He

FOR a country town, Beachmont was a remarkably lively and thriving place, even casting Farley, the county seat, into the shade.

Perhaps in speaking an exaggeration of this at one night with was the fact that Beachmont supported two lawyers—one "figure" Harley, whose office was over Smith's saloon; the other, "the" Adams, just across the way, whose very large sign, advertising Beachmont's hardware establishment.

"Figure" Harley was the elder of the two practitioners and the original one in Beachmont; Mr. Adams was a new comer, a "bustler" and in the estimation of many, a politician whose methods were not of the best. His name, however, was very well known to the town, for Mr. Adams had won a number of cases before the courts at Farley, which cases were before him and depended for their success entirely on the "sharp practice" that had characterized Mr. Adams's conduct of them.

For the last year the two lawyers had fought principally over a matter of local squabbles that had grown up from small to great between Mr. Fairbrother (Harley's client) and Mr. Crickmore, a very hardy and enterprising old man, well known to all.

At this very moment these two litigants were standing, their respective lawyers on opposite sides of the street, and Gus Wilson, leisurely strolling his bicycle down Main Street, while dreaming that he was going to be drawn for a time into the vortex of the litigation which had long agitated all Beachmont.

Gus made a very good as well as hardy looking figure in his well fitting bicycle suit and as he rode along with one hand only on the handle bar of his machine, he looked the impression of careless strength.

However, he was freewheeling rather enthusiastically and every now and then his might have been observed to bend his head a little over to one side as if he had suddenly become faint, or, perhaps, the slight squawk that came from one of the bearings of his machine.

Gus dismounted before Beachmont's hardware store.

"Hello!" said a familiar voice. "What are you up to?"

It was young Arthur Fairbrother, sitting in his father's buggy in front of the saddlery and tack switching the horse free off old Chester's back and neck.

"Hello, Art!" answered Gus. "I was just going to have to get a drop of oil. This blasted old machine of mine is like an old man who's always got a cough or an ache or something."

Arthur was climbing out of the buggy to come over to Gus.

"What is the matter now?"

"What? Oh, you know, in Adams's office you know."

"And the window's open."

"What's up? More trouble with your father?"

"If it's him, he's over at the 'square' this very minute. Got into another fight with Crick this very morning and now he's going to shut him up tight and for all this time."

"Heads all the way your father and Crick keep at it."

"Tain't no's fault, Art."

"Oh, I know. The whole town's on your side. Your father's such a bully, good natured, but few that I reckon it takes a long to get him going. But wait till I go in and get my oil changed," and Gus went into Beachmont's for a moment.

"As I was saying," said he, "he's boasting. 'It makes me tired to see Adams like this Crick riding around on his presumption while I've got to work to this old machine.'"

"All the same, you can just walk away from them with your 'old machine.'"

"That's just the point!" exclaimed Gus. "I can't walk away from them with my 'old machine.'"

"My son!" and Arthur turned over his father's shoulder to Harley's window. "You may go home. Tell mother I won't be back to dinner as I've got to drive over to Farley with the squab on important business."

"All right, father."

"Vainly selfish," persisted Gus. "I can beat every one around here with this old thing. You know that! And if I only had a modern machine, I could stand a mighty good show in the county court, how couldn't I?"

"The, Mother! you could," said Arthur. "However, I've got to run along home and whenever you get the much advanced of the old machine, just hand her over to me. I'll take good care of her old bones," and Arthur started homeward, leaving the horse and buggy for his father's use.

Meanwhile, up stairs in lawyer Adams's office there had been a deal of busy scribbling and excited talk.

"There, Mr. Crickmore! That's what I call pick work," lawyer Adams had said. "You oughtn't to be on this line. Here you gentlemen study odds on by witnessing this deal, and I'll be at your service in three minutes. Thank you! Now, Mr. Crickmore, I'm at least you'll have to put those papers over to the County Clerk's office your self. There's no time to lose. "I don't believe you take half enough care of her," said Arthur.

"Well, I don't believe I do," answered Gus. "She hasn't seemed to be worth it."

"Where's the matter with her?"

"She's old, she's been panned, rattles like a bag of bones—and then she's only an ordinary. Who takes an ordinary, nowadays?"

"You can bet I'd like one if I could get it."

"Well, I'd sell you this mighty cheap if I saw a chance of getting another—a baby, I think."

"What did you buy her for, any way? You haven't had her long a year yet and I remember you thought you owned the earth when you got it."

"It'll only last me a few months. But I was so hot to have a machine of my kind that I just jumped at the chance to buy this old second-hand thing for thirty dollars. If I'd only held off and saved up for about six months I'd have had enough to buy a decent wheel. But now—why even that little tricked two Crickmores—"

"Oh-h-h!" whispered Arthur. "Old Crick is just over your head."

CHAPTER I. A MOUNTAIN STRIKE.

LATE on a May afternoon, which in the high latitude of upper Michigan is equivalent to a March one farther south, the long train of north-bound men rolled into the little backwoods station of Conewago, stopped for half a minute, and as nobody either got off or on, glided forward again on its way.

Just as the stoppage had been an short pair of eyes looking from the last window of the rear passenger coach, had been enough to take to the whole scene, the small wooden station, with the deeply retired country road running behind it, through the virgin wilds of a sparsely settled region, and the clanking, heavy wheels that also stood at the door from the delta platform.

Conewago itself was not important to receive the home of a rail-way station, but it had been for a string of years pronounced "settled," and its small, shabby little, whose farming population carried their market produce down to Conewago, to be carried thence to the city by train.

But this time was no earlier one than that on which the heavy farmers were wont to return home, only a score of the most primitive description was filed in the stable doors, and without out of Conewago would have conferred to the ownership of such a horse or such a wagon.

The last chance of a Conewago who occupied the platform, had left their several names of labor at the sound of the approaching whistle, and had gathered with one accord to stare at one looking stranger who might arrive, and to pass word to their own neighbors on his appearance and possible business there, and much expectation and backwoods probability.

One there was who looked apart.

Dusty gathering of men here, it is said, by strong words, by king, who, whatever they are, is more than that any of them.

Such was the passenger who looked apart.

He was dressed in the only coat that was a suit here, which he had tipped on its edge that he might lean his long back against the railing. His hands were jammed deep in his trousers' pockets, his legs were crossed, as he to Gully, to advantage was broken through. His head was sunk between his shoulders, so that very little of him could be seen but a fringe of dark hair, a pair of narrow black eyes, which stared sleepily at nothing from under the lids of an ancient felt hat; a shiny roll coat, and a short black pipe, which swung from a nail of coarse hair beneath it.

As to his ownership, if his fellow Conewagians could tell, he was sure no, if they were asked, he was content of any, white or nigger, and low lived capacity for any admiration that would not money in his pocket without his having to work for every cent that he carried off the palm.

That is, as far as outward seeming went, and the man in the car thought he was a good judge of a good-looking man, as he didn't know him.

"Keney, are you still on the rail?" said this man in the car to another in the next behind him.

"Travelling 'em, sir," was the sheepish reply.

"Look as if he would be, eh?"

And now the man sat cross, scowling over his empty box.

"Oh, ain't that—I'm so lonely!" sighed the little voice, "only won't speak to me. I want my dad—ma—ma!"

"My George! they're stopping to take it water I do believe," maintained the young fellow with a horror strangely disproportionate to the occasion.

"Here—conclusion!"

A hurried conference, then he made an imperative sign to Keney, who bent over the back of the seat to catch his customer's whisper. "You've two minutes—wait here till the station while you make your bargain with me, and mind you don't drag me in. There—off with her."

THE CHILD, BRADING HERSELF UP THE WOODS, LEFT HER DANGEROUS MOTHER IN THE VERY JAWS OF THE BEAR.

"You're—was—affable," he said.

"At the next stopping place you will get off with you know, drive back and find that individual—transact your business, and come on in the later train. I will wait for you at St. Jean."

"Thank."

Evidently master and man—a handsome young master of wealth and position, and a confidential servant, irreproachable in his quiet eloquence to others. Travelers from afar, surrounded by all the familiar appliances of the wealthy wayfarer; travelers who had never before beheld luxury's ways, and most certainly never dared to behold it again.

"Only, I saw the ugly man too," sighed up a sweet little voice.

A little girl of five sat beside the man servant.

"Only," could not have heard, for he gave no sign; he kept his steady stepped back of a head to her and frowned into vacancy.

"Poor Keney, you won't like to have to go back and find such an ugly man," said the child again.

The man servant fixed the little girl in his arms, saying with a whirling grin.

"Your trade says I'm to take you for a hour to the city, there's plenty time, so you must be blossoming' third a-certain' so long."

At the door she looked back, somewhat startled, at her handsome young master, beckoning him to follow; but seeming reassured by his smile and nod, kissed her little hand to him and was borne out of his sight.

Then his smile gave place to a pondering frown—his face grew pale.

"All ugly business—but a necessity," he pondered, averting his gaze from the other passenger, "poor little wretch, I'm sorry enough for her, I never know, but it was either this or I."

Keney waited at the station with the child in his arms, doing his best to suppress the eager scrutiny of the baggage, some clumsy attempt had been made to hide her rich dress under an outer coat which had evidently been purchased with great attention to its two golden hair had been

CHAPTER I.

A BOY'S HOME REVISITED.

"I don't, Bob, Hinkley met with quite a windfall, didn't he?"

The youth addressed as Bob turned and looked at the companion with whom he was walking down Commonwealth Avenue toward the Common.

"Why, what do you mean, Thop?" he demanded. "What's happened to Hinkley?"

"Theophilus Gray, or Thop, as he was generally called, replied quickly:

"You remember the old sailor he pulled out of the water at City Point last fall?"

Well, the ancient sea dog made his home at Hinkley's place in South Boston during the winter, paying his board, as Hinkley told me, every Saturday night. His mother, you know, takes in washing and does for meals, and from dollars and a half a week helped them out wonderfully.

So, I guess the old man didn't mind with it anything but a little one by

and. This spring, about a month ago, he faded out entirely, and Hinkley says he never felt so lonesome as he did, because he doesn't remember his own father at all.

Thop stopped for breath, and Bob waited guard at his impatience.

"I don't see where the windfall comes in," he said. "It seems to me that the old sailor's demise was more of a misfortune than anything else financially, because the expense of his burying was only a trifle."

"What do you think," rejoined

Thop. "It seems that the old man never forgot Hinkley's bravery, and when he died, indeed, he left a will in which his executor bore a very prominent position."

Bob Hinkley pushed his lips in a prolonged whistle.

"You don't say so?" he exclaimed.

"Why, I thought all along the man was about the same as a pauper, and wondered if Hinkley's folks learned how for nothing. What did our current friend's bequest amount to?"

"Quite a considerable sum, I trust," replied Thop. "But how he comes now, he'll give us all the particulars."

The two boys had come thus far toward the Common, and now rose from the broad shaded lawn scowp-ing and looked probably in a youth of sixteen who stood before them, his eyes widening rapidly in the bright April sunshine.

It was this intimacy which had fastened the conversation of Hinkley upon him.

"How do you do, Mr. Carrall?" said Bob, extending his hand with a good show of cordiality.

"Allow me to congratulate you upon your auspicious position to wealth. Shall you purchase a residence on Commonwealth Avenue or will you retire to the classic shades of South Cove?"

"Bob, who was a year or so older than Hinkley and wearing a dead sailor's grizzled down upon him, while Thop wore into a laugh.

"I don't see what Hinkley," said Thop.

"He's anxious. Now give us the facts in the case about your good fortune."

The three seated themselves, and then the Carroll boy began.

"This sailor, whose name was Hinkley, always seemed to have plenty of money, in spite of his poverty-stricken appearance. He kept talking all winter, and shortly after he died a lawyer told us that there was a will in which a bequest was made to me on certain conditions being fulfilled. These conditions were not made known to me until yesterday."

"I DON'T SEE WHERE THE WINDFALL COMES IN," SAID BOB.

"What were they?" demanded Bob, who, as the eldest of the three, felt that he occupied a superior position as adviser. "That with it, Hinkley?"

"I was about to tell you," said Carrall, "when you interrupted me. This fellow had a brother living somewhere on the Mississippi river, or he was what he last heard from him. Now the conditions are that I search for and find this brother or bring back satisfactory proof of his death."

"If he is alive he and I share equally the property left by the deceased. If dead, and no timely service him, then I am to have it all."

"And what is the amount?" inquired Bob, who seemed very anxious to discover the extent of Hinkley's good fortune.

Hinkley shook his head.

"I don't know," he replied, "nor will I find out till after I have settled this matter as to whether or not this other fellow is alive."

"Why not advertise in the papers? Wouldn't that be the readiest and easiest way to find him?"

asked Thop.

Hinkley laughed.

"From what this sailor told me I should judge that they know very little about newspapers in that region. It's going to be quite a hunt."

"The lawyer has already written to all of the principal places on the river, but can get no information. He advised me to start at once and explore this part of the province of New Brunswick thoroughly. You and Thop know something about wild regions; why can't I go with you on both of you to go with me?" added Hinkley, looking toward Bob.

"I guess I can go," responded the latter. "Father wants me to learn the plumbing business, but tells me there is no hurry. He has a big contract to commence in July and wants me to begin in the deep about that time. That leaves two months and a half to reserve me. I can promise him that this little trip will be just the thing to build me up after my hard

Thop gave vent to a loud laugh.

"It was a hard winter, for a fact,"

he said. "I pined the winter. No winter, after the brilliant showing you made, your respectful eye has decided to make a fresh start of you."

"I think I could pay you in the expectation if it weren't for the expense.

I tucked away so much money this winter that I am afraid father would not approve a dollar."

"Oh, as to that," said Hinkley quickly, "it will cost you nothing.

All expenses will be paid by the lawyer, who is executor of the will.

What do you say?"

"When do you want to start?"

asked Bob.

"Let's see," replied Hinkley. "This is Wednesday, the tenth of April.

We ought to be ready to start by last Monday, the thirteenth. The snow is all gone long ago, and there will be lots of good fishing. The old sailor told me stories about the trout and salmon he caught when a boy that made me hungry now."

"How long will we be gone?"

inquired Thop.

"We'll be back in a month, perhaps sooner," rejoined Hinkley confidently.

"The lawyer advised me to go up to

Woodstock, New Brunswick, and from there it is only a few miles across to the head waters of the Mississippi river. Then follow down the river to its mouth, and take a steamer from there home."

After a little deliberation the three boys approved, promising to meet the next day on the Com-

A BOY'S HOME REVISITED.

"I don't, Bob, Hinkley met with quite a windfall, didn't he?"

The youth addressed as Bob turned and looked at the companion with whom he was walking down Commonwealth Avenue toward the Common.

"Why, what do you mean, Thop?" he demanded. "What's happened to Hinkley?"

"Theophilus Gray, or Thop, as he was generally called, replied quickly:

"You remember the old sailor he pulled out of the water at City Point last fall?"

Well, the ancient sea dog made his home at Hinkley's place in South Boston during the winter, paying his board, as Hinkley told me, every Saturday night. His mother, you know, takes in washing and does for meals, and gives dollars and a half a week helped there, and wonderfully so.

So, I guess the old man didn't need much of anything but a little care to live. This spring, about a month ago, he faded and entirely, and Hinkley says he never felt so lonely since he left home, because he doesn't remember his own father at all."

Thop stopped for breath, and Bob

Watson gazed at him in surprise.

"I don't see where the windfall comes in," he said. "It seems to me that the old sailor's demise was more of a misfortune than anything else financially, because the expense of his keeping was only a trifle."

"What do you think, Thop?"

"It seems that the old man never forgot Hinkley's bravery, and when he died, indeed, he left a will in which his property was a very prominent position."

Bob Watson pushed his lips in a prolonged whistle.

"You don't say so?" he exclaimed.

"Why, I thought all along the man was about the same as a pauper, and wondered if Hinkley's folks learned how for nothing. What did our mutual friend's bequest amount to?"

"Quite a considerable sum, I trust," replied Thop. "But how he comes now, he'll give us all the particulars."

The two boys had come thus far along toward the Common, and now rose from the benches they had been occupying and looked probably in a youth of sixteen who stood before them, his eyes shining rapidly in the bright April sunshine.

It was this intimacy which had fastened the conversation of Hinkley upon him.

"How do you do, Mr. Carrall?" said Bob, extending his hand with a good show of cordiality.

"Allow me to congratulate you upon your auspicious position to wealth. Shall you purchase a residence on Commonwealth Avenue or will you retire to the classic shades of South Cove?"

"Bob, who was a year or so older than Hinkley and came a head taller, grasped down upon him, while Thop bent into a laugh.

"I don't see why, Hinkley," said Thop.

"He's serious. Now give us the facts in the case about your good fortune."

The three seated themselves, and then the Carrall boy began:

"This sailor, whose name was Hinkley, always seemed to have plenty of money, in spite of his poverty-stricken appearance. The Double Shot.

BY HENRY T. MARSHALL.

THE party consisted of several gentlemen and three ladies, and they were starting from Virginia City with pleasure and pack mules on route to the Yellowstone Park, with the avowed purpose of hunting a little by the way before reaching the limits of the reservation.

It was a unique expedition; the journey was to be long and rough, particularly for the ladies, but the party was provided with every assurance that money could provide to ease the journey and make camping comfortable.

It is surprising that no one wrote a book about that expedition, for it was filled with incident and adventure from beginning to end. But the most striking incident was one involving the pretense and the selfish members of the party—old Bill Jenks the guide and young Miss Towndley, the belle of the company.

Bill had been sitting alone, chatting with Mr. Towndley when they were they out from Virginia City, when a sudden scream from behind made both of the leaders pull up and wheel around.

It was only an Indian, who had appeared suddenly from a covey on the margin; and the guide looked at him indifferently or gave him a nod of recognition, but his appearance might well have excited the fear of the hunting women, for he was a particularly ugly specimen of his not too handsome sex, being principally to the deep and disquieting marks of the mud-pot which had been into his face.

He was twirling along with his gun over his arm beside the striding woman, saying, "How do, lady?" when old Bill came up like a cyclone and nearly rode the Indian down.

"Now, what if you want?" demanded Bill.

"Now do, Bill," said the Indian. "Now do, lady! What guide?"

"No, you don't," answered Bill with a snap. "And you'd oughter know enough not to ask when you are not along with the party."

"Good guide! About bad, rabbit, mark!"

"Get along with you. We'll attend to that for ourselves."

"Oh, Mr. Jenks, it would be such fun to have an Indian along with us, wouldn't it, father?"

"Oh, Helen," from the other ladies, "how could you?"

"How do, lady?" from the reliable, who recognized one advocate at least.

"Scuse me, miss," interposed Bill. "but I've got the responsibility of taking care of this here party, an' I wouldn't feel able to close that an' answer an eye on Peter Pook besides."

"But, Mr. Jenks, I'm sure he wouldn't be any trouble, and I could—"

"Nigger's your name, miss, but you don't know Peter Pook, do you? He's famous for being about as bad an Indian as they ever been out."

"No, no, good Indian," protested Peter Pook. "no, no, no, steady, and a nigger, ha-ha! double-ha-ha! other things I couldn't go by—Peter is certainly a champion, I do assure you."

"I said—" Miss Towndley was beginning when her father interposed with:

"Mr. Jenks knows best, Helen."

"Get along, now, Peter! Mowzy!" and Bill gave him a dig with the muzzle of his rifle.

But Peter was not so easily got rid of. He waited a moment, "loose," and he waited some powder, and he finally slipped around Bill's horse towards "Don't, Mr. Jenks! He will hurt you!" cried Miss Towndley.

Bill paused and looked at the young lady.

"Thank you, miss, but I couldn't not."

"Now I told you to get," he continued to Peter, as he held him by a handful of old red shirt, "and I meant it. If you show up again, I'll put a ball into you," and he gave Peter a thing that would have done justice to a metropolitan policeman in a holiday mood.

Peter half raised his rifle. Now Miss Towndley did cry out, but Bill took a quick step toward the Indian, whereat that ugly customer turned and ran and was soon lost in sight.

"Mr. Jenks, how could you treat him so?" remonstrated Miss Towndley. "He might have shot you and I'm sure he intended to."

"But he ran away instead," said Bill with an admiring but respectful glance. "Peter Pook was never known to shoot from the front in the open."

"Then he has shot people?"

"Well, I don't say he hasn't," replied Bill carelessly.

"He certainly did look wicked enough to do it," commented Miss Towndley. "and after seeing that dangerous glance he gave you, I confess I could not stand having him near me."

"Nonsense! I shan't you, miss, by handling him so rough, but believe me, it's the only way to treat his kind when you want him to understand you mean business."

Peter Pook did not appear again that morning.

Camp was pitched that afternoon in a sheltered nook on a high level. It was near sunset and there was nothing particular to do, except for the ladies.

Miss Towndley took it into her head to improve her skill with the rifle, so she improved the services of old Bill, and, taking one of the Indian guns in the armory, she wandered away with the rough old guide.

Coming to a spot which presented a beautiful panorama of sloping mountainside below and the last peak, some six ranges beyond, just tipped with the gold of the setting sun, Miss Towndley seated herself on a rock and made room for Bill beside her.

These two were already good friends. The young lady, like all of her sex, was fully aware that the old and hardened hunter was filled with admiration for her, and she felt able without qualms to him as well as the interest inspired by such a novel character.

So they chatted unconsciously, oblivious of the fact that a peck marked Indian was slowly crawling down a bush covered slope, evidently with the object of gaining a thump of bushes about twenty feet from them and some hundred and fifty yards away.

Miss Towndley was well chatting with her usual freedom, when she became aware that Bill was not paying his usual attention.

SO THEY CHATTERED, OBVIOUSLY OF THE FACT THAT AN INDIAN WAS CRAWLING DOWN A BUSH COVERED SLOPE VERY NEAR AT HAND.

the Indian, whom they observed again, excepting Miss Towndley, who appeared not at all afraid.

Bill had one leg over his horse's back when Peter Pook doubled he had better quit, so he leaped aside into the underbrush, and the cavaliers resumed their march.

The women resumed the subject of much Indian talk between Bill and Miss Towndley; but at last the conversation lagged and Bill rode on ahead.

All supposed they had seen the last of the bad Indian, but about two hours later, as they were partially taking up a steep divide, Peter appeared among the shrubs in the rear, and grinning as usual, began to beg for a drink of beer.

Gradually he worked himself forward without exciting any particular notice until there was a clink and the Mr. Jenks. When that individual turned in his saddle, he saw Peter Pook in the very act of placing his hand on Miss Towndley's arm with a pistol. "How do?"

Bill threw himself off his horse, and in a few minutes he had the Indian by the throat.

Bill paused and looked at the young lady.

"Thank you, miss, but I couldn't not."

"Now I told you to get," he continued to Peter, as he held him by a handful of old red shirt, "and I meant it. If you show up again, I'll put a ball into you," and he gave Peter a thing that would have done justice to a metropolitan policeman in a holiday mood.

A DIFFIDENT STARRHEAD.

"WELL, good by, Rodney! I have asked tomorrow, I am going to leave a trade."

"I am sorry to part with you, David. Couldn't you stay another week?"

"No, my uncle says I must be making my money, and I have a chance to leave the same man's trade."

"Where are you going?"

"To Sheffield, some twenty miles away. I wish I were in your shoes. You have no money, and you can't go to school."

"I don't know how I am to get on, David. I only know that my guardian pays my expenses at this boarding school."

"Yes, you are a star-headed, and have the school room in the institution. I am only a poor day scholar. Still I feel thankful that I have been allowed to remain as long as I have. Who is your guardian?"

"A Mr. Beaumont Fielding, of New York."

"Is he a business man?"

"I believe so."

"Do you know how much you will inherit when you come of age?"

"I haven't an idea."

"It seems to me your guardian ought to have told you."

"I scarcely know my guardian. His name I spent a week at his house. I don't remember much about it except that he lives in a handsome house, and has plenty of servants. Since then, as you know, I have passed most of my time here, except that in the summer I was allowed to board at the Catskills or any country place I might select."

"Yes, and I remember one year you took me with you and paid all my expenses. I shall never forget your kindness, and how much I enjoyed that summer."

"Rodney Raper smiled, and his smile made his usually grave face look very attractive."

"My dear David," he said, "it was all selfishness on my part. I knew I should enjoy myself much better with a companion."

"You may call that selfishness, Rodney, but it is a kind of selfishness that makes me your devoted friend. How long do you think you shall remain at school?"

"I don't know. My guardian has never told me his plans for me. I wish he would."

"I shall advise you, Rodney, but we will correspond, won't we?"

"Naturally. You know I shall always feel interested in you and your welfare."

David was a plain boy of humble parentage, and would probably be a hard working mechanic. In fact he looked for nothing better.

But Rodney Raper seemed to be of gentle blood, and had the eye of one who had been brought up a gentleman. But different as they were in social

"Rodney," he said, "the doctor would like to see you in his office."

"Very well, Raper, I will go down at once."

He put aside his book, and went down to the office of Dr. Sampson on the first floor.

The doctor was sitting at his desk. He turned slightly as Rodney entered.

"Take a seat, Raper," he said calmly.

His tone was so different from his usual cordiality that Rodney was somewhat surprised.

"And I really am?"

"No, I am not," he said.

"Dr. Sampson doesn't seem as friendly as usual."

"After a brief pause, Dr. Sampson's face became more as friendly as usual."

"I have a letter for you from your guardian, Raper," he said.

"Here it is. Do me the favor to read it here."

With some misgivings Rodney took the letter and read as follows:

"Dear Rodney, I have had much to consider lately. As you know, I was left by your father in charge of you and your fortune. I have never yet seen the money, but I will say now that it was about fifty thousand dollars. I had two years since I kept it hidden, but I have begun a series of inquiries in which my own fortune was involved."

"In the hope of finding out the truth about the money, I have been very busy. I am sorry to say that I have not been able to see your money. That was also, and one of the main reasons for my leaving you here. I have not enough to pay the balance of your school bills, having your possessions. How much I regret that I cannot tell you. I shall leave New York at once. I do not mean at present to see you more than I can go, but I shall try to make good the loss, and eventually return to you your own fortune. I may be successful or I may not. I shall do my best, and I hope in time to have better news to communicate."

"One thing I am glad to say. I have a market value for your mother's jewels. These are valued. I shall send you a check by express, knowing that you will wish to keep them out of regard to your mother's memory. In case you are refused in the necessity of passing on selling them, I am sure that your mother, could she be consulted, would advise you to do so. This would be better than to have you suffer from want."

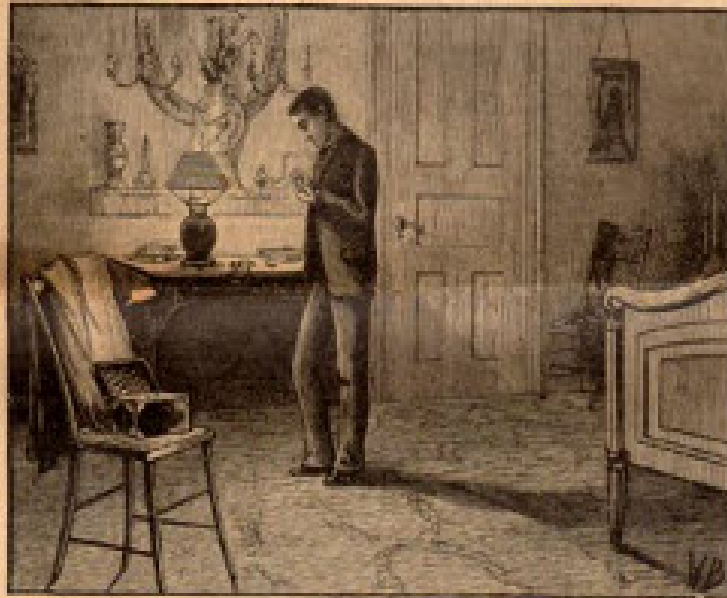

"There is nothing further for me to write except to repeat my regrets, and assure my promise to make up your lost fortune if I shall ever be able to do so."

Your guardian,

Beaumont Fielding.

Rodney read this letter once. In an instant he was reduced from the position of a favorite of fortune to a needy beggar, with his living to make.

He could not help recalling what had passed between his friend David and himself earlier in the day. Now he was as poor as David—poorer, in fact, for David had a chance to earn a trade that would yield him a living, while he was utterly without resources, except in having an immensely good education.

RODNEY EXAMINED THE LETTER AND HIS HEART WAS SHAKEN.

position the two boys had always been devoted friends.

The boarding school of which Rodney was, as his friend expressed himself, a star pupil, was situated about fifty miles from the city of New York. It was under the charge of Dr. Sampson, a tall, thin man of fair scholarship, kindly alive to his own interests, who showed partiality for his richer pupils, and whenever he had occasion to remove him most heavily upon boys like David Hill, who was poor.

Rodney occupied alone the finest room in the school. There was a great contrast between his comfortable quarters and the extremely plain dormitories occupied by less favored pupils.

In the case of some boys the favoritism of the teacher would have led them to get on airs, and made them unpopular with their school fellows. But Rodney had too much a nature to be influenced by such considerations. He enjoyed his comfortable room, but treated his school fellows with a frank cordiality that made him a general favorite.

After David left his room Rodney sat down to prepare a lesson in Greek, when he was interrupted by the entrance through the half open door of a porter's boy.

"I shall try to make good the loss, and eventually return to you your own fortune. I may be successful or I may not. I shall do my best, and I hope in time to have better news to communicate."

CHAPTER I.

FARMING THROUGH DIFFICULTIES OF CULTURE.

IT was about eleven o'clock, A. M. A north-bound train was due at the Manhattan station in a few minutes and a constant stream of passengers for the city was pouring past the ticket puncher at the door of the waiting room.

A little apart from the crowd was a small, red-haired, bushy-haired boy sitting on a box of goods. He was leaning his back against the side of the case and his feet were working vigorously; every now and then he moderately pulled a long string of gum from between his teeth and then gathered it in again by a characteristic use of tongue and lips.

This young fellow was accented by a touch of somewhat longer build, who had straddled aimlessly down the track.

"Hello, Tommie!"

"Hello yourself."

"Let's go to school."

"Can't."

"Why not?"

"I'm waiting for Larry Hildreth."

"Who's he?"

"Don't you remember Larry Hildreth?"

"You oughter. He gave you a pretty good kick."

"I don't remember him by."

"Told't so. Nobody would here ever give me a kick."

"You say it well. Guess you found it a hardy thing to forget them. It was just before Larry went away, just three years ago. You were pounding me one day outside the school house and Larry came along and pulled me out."

"Oh, I know who you mean—that little black-haired fellow who used to run away and Mr. Gregory's guardian of."

LARRY SPREAD TO HIS FEET AND THEN HAD TO GRASP THE BACK OF HIS CHAIR FOR SUPPORT AS HIS KNEE BEGAN TO SHAKE UNDER HIS EYES.

"Yes, that's the one; and he just took the light out of you in two minutes."

"No he didn't! I gave him a good black eye."

"And he hit you on the nose, and you quit right there."

"I had a nose bleed and I had to go to the camp."

"I don't know anything about that; but you didn't have any more fight in you and you went away in a hurry."

"You don't want to say he whipped me, or it'll be worse for you."

"Well, he did."

"See that again, and I'll hit you, Tommie!"

"Take a fellow your size, Sam Bender, who had come up unprepared."

"What have you got to say about it, Tommie? I can take a hell out of you, too, if you say the word."

"I don't think I'll say the word, Sam. Say, what are you always trying to get up a fight for? You be peaceable, Sam, and you'll have lots more fun."

Charlie Eaton's Loan.

By William D. Howen.

CHARLIE EATON occupied the top floor back at Mrs. Bangworthy's popular lodging and table board establishment in Fourth Street, Nos. 225 and 227. His neighbor in the hall back-room was Mr. Augustus Caesar Smith.

Mr. Smith was a gentleman of great literary talent, who, by reason of a conspiracy against him among the publishers of high class literature, was compelled to render away his literary resources in the composition of such stories and tales for the comic papers.

Charlie worked for a wholesale drug house during the day and free evenings a week at attended the stenography class at Cooper Union. As he was so much away from his lodgings, he saw and knew very little of Mr. Smith. In fact, that gentleman did not make advantage of Mrs. Bangworthy's liberal terms for table board, and was always leaving secret men at the door.

So all that Charlie ever saw of Mr. Augustus Caesar Smith was when they happened to meet on the stairs. Other such meetings were rather few, as Mr. Smith was apparently a very considerably person on his legs and the halls very narrow. Sometimes the negro waiter had to help him up to his room, and such was the literary gentleman's apparent infirmities.

One evening when Charlie happened to be in his room, and the sound of nervous footings in the hall below indicated that Mr. Smith was at home, there came a sharp knock at the author's door, followed by a dialogue between Mr. Bangworthy and Mr. Smith, every word of which was audible to Charlie Eaton in the next room.

"Now look where, Mr. Smith!"

"With pleasure, madam," interrupted Mr. Smith. "The author has never tired of looking upon faces of grace and beauty."

"Don't you think you can get soap for Mr. Smith, with your 'faces of grace and beauty'?"

"I've done with looking, Mr. Smith, and I mean business now. I'll take the rent for this room if you please, Mr. Smith—four weeks at three a week, which is twelve dollars, if I figure right."

"My dear madam, your figures are as correct as your face."

"What I want, Mr. S., is a 'taste' of your money."

"Unfortunately, madam, I have not the required sum at hand, sorry to say."

"Going to a bank—what woman, what has had her eyes opened, Mr. Smith, and isn't going to make a fool of herself any longer or be made a fool of, either."

"Madam, it would be impossible to change the headquarters of Providence and make a fool out of a woman so manfully endowed with good sense."

"Stop right where you are, Mr. Smith! That trick of soft-soaping people is all of a piece with your other tricks, Mr. Smith. My eyes has been opened to you, Mr. Smith. I know where your money goes—up to Okey's saloon on the corner, Mr. Smith. And won't take a honest woman's table board at reasonable prices, Mr. Smith, but you take your own along with your throat and your free lunches up at Okey's. And won't bother day in and day out in such a state as what's bringing disgrace on a respectable woman, and a house what's never had a stain on its reputation before you come, Mr. Smith."

"Madam, if you refer to my occasional use of these there was a clapping and rubbing of hands, and then a considerable silence, followed by the opening and shutting of Mr. Smith's door.

"Almost immediately there was a knock at Charlie's door, and Mr. Smith himself answered the 'come in'."

"The author had a number of rolls of paper under his arm. They looked like manure."

"Good evening, young Mr. S.," said Mr. Smith.

"Good evening, Mr. Smith."

"Ah, you know my name! Then, doubtless, you also know something of the slight reputation which I have been able to bring from the grasp of the literary monopoly."

"I may say I am somewhat acquainted with your reputation, Mr. Smith. What do you wish to see me about?"

"Mr. Smith advanced to the table at which Charlie was sitting, and deposited thereon his collection of manuscripts."

"Capital, young Mr. S.," he exclaimed, "passing to these."

"Literary capital?"

"That up for the present, Mr. Smith," suggested Charlie.

"Partially. A very apt remark, my young friend—very apt; showing also a familiarity with financial terms which is very encouraging."

"Thank you, Mr. Smith, for the compliment. I wish to consult you about a confidence."

"A financial matter, Mr. Smith?"

"Precisely, my young friend. I note and admire your keen and rapid perception. Let me explain—"

"—at perhaps you may have heard something of a painful interview which occurred a short while ago in the next room."

"Well, yes, Mr. Smith; it does not require much penetration to hear what passed through these thin walls."

"That my young friend, was a most fortunate interview for me."

"Fortunate? I heard Mrs. Bangworthy tell you to get out on Monday, unless—"

"Unless I could get the few paltry dollars into her greivous hands. Precisely! She has put them into mine, sir."

"I don't understand, Mr. Smith."

"I will explain. That interview has given me a sinking—I may say, what brilliant—idea. For a story, or—"

"—a novel of fifty chapters, in which a poor but high-spirited poet, driven from his lodgings by a merciless landlord, rushes to the river's brink."

"Explain, Mr. Smith," interrupted Charlie.

"But I must go out in five minutes to my night class. If you will state what you desire, I will give you an answer."

"In brief, then, young man, I need a few dollars to oppose the clamors of Mrs. Bangworthy. I appeal to you in the sacred name of art to advance me this money in order that I may be able to complete in undisturbed seclusion the work which I feel will be the masterpiece of Augustus Caesar Smith."

"Mr. Smith, my answer is easily given. I am poor myself and cannot afford to lend."

"But observe—these manuscripts. I propose to have them with you for security. Fifty dollars' worth, my young Mr. S., is security for a paltry twelve."

"The security is not what I should call glibly edged, Mr. Smith."

"But it is my capital—all I have. Is that not a sufficient guarantee of my good faith?"

"Your faith may be all right—I am not so sure circumstances, you are doubtless not aware that the man engaged in literary invention often times meets such sharp and sudden trials."

"GOOD EVENING, MR. SMITH," SAID CHARLIE, HESITANTLY.

"Mental strain, is it? How about mine, when I see the money that belongs to me by right, going into the hands of a scoundrel of a saloon keeper?"

"Madam, I—"

"Now look where, Mr. Smith, I said I trust business, and I mean what I say. If that twelve dollars isn't in my hands by Monday morning, and you give me my bag and baggage, which is precisely little, I make, and not worth my holding in it. You hear me? Out you go!"

"My dear Mr. S.—"

"Don't fear me, when you're getting off so cheap, as ought to be put in bed for such conduct. Out you go Monday morning if that rent isn't paid."

"Then Mrs. Bangworthy slammed the door and was gone; and Mr. Smith's nervous footsteps were again heard pacing the floor."

Charlie Eaton could not help feeling for the man thus threatened with expulsion, for there had been a time, not very long ago either, when he himself had not known where to turn for a night's lodging or even his next meal.

"True, Mr. Smith may have drunk up his meagre savings and may now have been an altogether deserving person, but even so, he was still to be pitied."

While thus meditating, Charlie was suddenly startled by an exclamation from the next room.

"Hark! hark! Hark! I have it! Splendid! Capital!"

Lester's Luck.

CHAPTER I. A RUSTY GUN.

Lester was not out. He decided to wait until the next morning to come to the door if they could not give him a better thing, even though he had not seen any more of the old man's gun.

"It is almost ten o'clock," he said to himself, "and I have not yet seen the old man. I will wait until the next morning."

He opened the door and stepped out into the street.

A pleasant breeze was blowing from the west.

"That is good," he said to himself, "it is too hot to stay in the house."

He walked down the street, looking at the people who were passing.

Black Cloud Peak.

BY H. A. STANLEY.

THE day suddenly began looking dreary, and a moment later a great storm was loosed in the air.

The boys passed, and with their guns held ready for instant use, waited for the storm to pass. They were much amused, it was the first cloudy day of the season, and the boys of the neighborhood were all out to see the storm.

There was the sound of the gun, for now he could see the smoke of the explosion at the end.

"He sure you take good aim," he said.

The sentence was not completed, for at that moment the smoke of the gun was suddenly seen, and a boy who was standing near the gun was seen to be in the air.

The boys were so excited that they forgot to shoot, and with the smoke of the gun before them, they were all looking at the boy who was in the air.

Then Oscar recovered himself with a gasp.

"As for other men," he looked at the gun and pressed the trigger, but the work of his own weapon was the only one heard, and the boy was seen to be in the air, and the smoke of the gun was seen to be in the air.

"The shot was not sufficiently accurate to prove fatal, and the young sportsman turned to his friends, looking at them with a gasp.

"What a shot! you shot! I told you to shoot. If you had shot, you would have killed him dead. You're a fine lot of children, aren't you?"

"Don't be so hard," said Harry Gage.

"You have nothing to know of it, you were not present when you shot Oscar to death."

"I did, sir. Well, I'll have that answer, and don't you forget it," said Oscar, looking at Harry.

"I don't think you will," said Harry, looking at Oscar.

"I'll make you," said Harry, looking at Oscar.

He knew he had attempted a decidedly dangerous enterprise in crossing the peak, but he was angry at the boys, and he was not at all sorry to see them.

The Hobart Diamonds.

BY W. BART PATTER.

I MET Spink last June when I ran down to the great Harvard-Vale boat race. I hadn't seen him before for eight years and shouldn't have loved him then only he boarded the same train that some as myself and came out at dawn on the next morning.

"Ted, old man, how are you?" he asked, gripping my hand with fervor.

"Just the same as ever, only getting a little old," I replied, with a laugh.

"Old? You're right. Look here," and he removed his hat, displaying a pronounced bald spot upon his crown. "Doesn't that look like it? But I felt as though it was only yesterday when I had ever that same crown unspoiled, just twenty years ago. Well, well! I've got a lot at home about old enough to talk about going to college. It made me feel young again to meet so many of the boys. Did you see Karin Hobart there?"

"Karin Hobart?" repeated, regarding my brother for some momentary effort to recall a person. "Doesn't seem to remember any fellow by that name."

"You don't? Well, he was a junior when we were forty years old, so I don't wonder you've forgotten him. He came from the same town as myself and had sort of a friendly interest in him."

"But what of him? You spoke as though there was something in the mind."

"Nothing, only when I saw him last he'd taken up a good deal of a big fortune. I know all about it at the time, but I'd never seen the fellow before to corroborate him."

"Quite a small sum, I suppose," suggested I. "What's the figure?"

"Not far from half a million," Spink responded coolly. "Didn't you ever hear of the Hobart diamonds?"

"I never, never."

"You must have been mis-reading about that time, and missed it all. It happened two years ago and the papers were full of it. I tell you, they made half a million as famous as the value of some person's fortune. So they had his picture in all the papers."

"Come, let's hear about it," I said. "I'm always ready to hear of other people's good luck. You're time enough before we get to Providence, aren't you?"

"I may look kind of that's about all," Spink declared. "Of course Karin would never have had a hundredth part of his property. The way of it was that Karin was the only child of people in pretty moderate circumstances, but he had a great uncle—Simon Hobart, by name—who lived in New York and had become immensely wealthy in trade, but old Simon would have nothing to do with Karin's folks, because of some family slight he had received at their hands. And Simon Karin had no expression in that direction, and when he graduated from college he went down to New York and accepted a position in a wholesale house.

"Just by chance he happened to meet old Simon and the old fellow was wonderfully taken with him. Heated him to be a memorandum on the subject of leaving his money. Watched the papers all the time for any failure, and seemed to fear that all his cash and securities were liable to be swept away and he left position."

"The last obtained such a strong diamond merchant, and diamonds are always worth their face value. He went did he do but for all his available property into stocks, buying them of several dealers. Of course he did not do it all at once, for it might have attracted the price on such variables, but he was two years in exchanging his lands slowly and other securities for the gems. And then, when the transfer was completed, he looked at the stocks up in the vault at the house, rather than trust a bank. Oh, he was quite content.

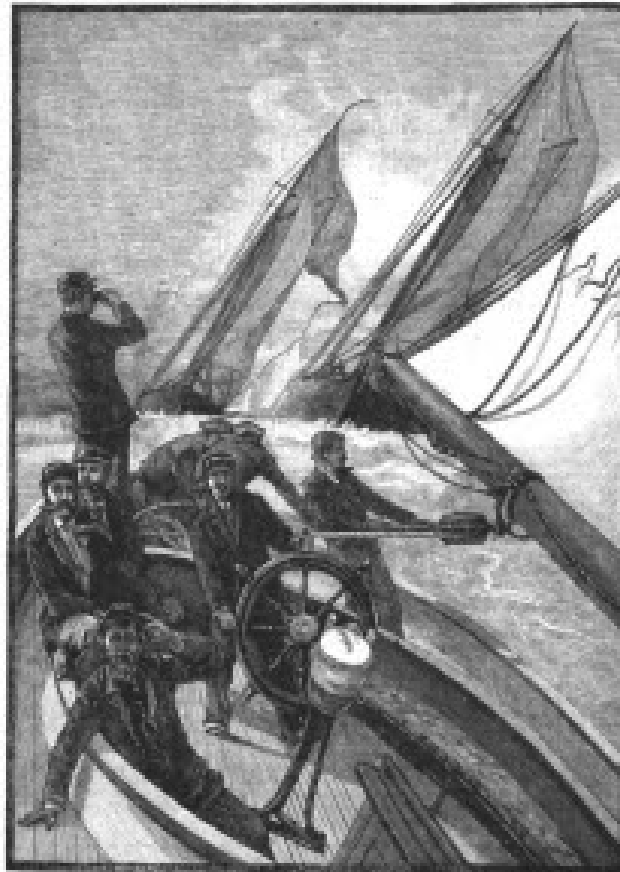

"There were just two men, besides Karin, whom the old fellow had any confidence in, and they were as widely separated as two men could be. One was the old butler, a tall, full-bellied man named Jerome, and the other a man named George Stanton, a broker who had done considerable business for old Simon. Stanton, so Karin says, was every inch a sharper and looked it, too; but for some reason the old man had taken a great fancy to him, had him at the house to dinner, and made him the executor of his will. Karin met him several times and liked him very much and knew each time he was him, although Stanton did everything possible to ingratiate himself with young Hobart."

"Karin did not understand the broker's manner for being so polite and deferential to him at the time, but later, he comprehended it. Without the least warning, one day, old Simon Hobart died, and when his papers were examined, a will was found making Karin his sole heir, while George Stanton appeared as executor."

"Karin was surprised as you may believe, when the contents of that will were made public and he was by no means pleased to find Stanton the executor. He didn't have a bit of confidence in the fellow and knowing that the great majority of his grandfather's property was in diamonds, he determined to attend personally to their disposal so that Stanton would be unable to make more than his legal commission on the sale."

"While Stanton was negotiating for purchasers, the gems remained in the vault at the house, and old Jerome was left in guard the house and guard the watchman, as well, for Karin felt as though there was really no one he could trust but the old butler. Karin did not remain long at the house after his great uncle's death, for it was in the summer and he had found among some odds and ends of his uncle's property a pretty fair sized party named the Westbrook, and taking a party of his friends, he went off to her for a fortnight, while Stanton was struggling out the legalities of the situation."

"Karin had never cared anything particular for old Simon, and never pretended that he did, and was a fellow who didn't believe in showing a countenance of respect, he didn't feel for the old man's memory, so he went off to the Westbros without any compunction. He told me that after he got away he to his house and to his club—the latter, as Karin himself expressed it, containing as he stated a sort of human trash as it had been his fortune to see—and where who made much of him.

"At this time, you must know, old Stanton had left trade. He had always been of an exceedingly careful and parsimonious disposition and as long as he wouldn't risk his money in business any longer, but sold out to his partners and retired to his big house on one of the up town avenues. I judge he was as big a miser as one generally finds and he got hold upon him that he discharged nearly all his servants and lived in one or two rooms of the house so as to reduce his expenses. At length a little bank in which he had some money did fail and the old man lost three or four thousand dollars. The more cautious he advanced by any more it three or four thousand and he was every cent he possessed. He was almost dumb for a time. He believed none of his execution sale and accepted all the blame to feel because one had gone to the wall."

"In his panic old Simon had been a

An Odd Witness.

BY W. BERT FOSTER.

"LOOK here, Guy," Edgar Thompson pulled his friend's coat sleeve and directed his attention to a crowd on the opposite side of the way. They were watching through the principal street of the village of Kenton toward the railroad station.

The two friends were passing a crowd of men in the uniform of the employees of the New York & Southern Railroad. Edgar's cap was adorned with a band on which was lettered "Station Agent," while any man who was familiar with the different uniforms would have pronounced Guy a policeman.

Edgar was, in fact, the station agent at Kenton while Guy Treasman was the haggard on the afternoon express—the "pig ridge." It was called—between Kenton and Hightstown, the terminus of the eastern branch of the road.

Kenton was at the junction of the western branch and the main line and the position of agent was a responsible one, but young Thompson possessed dignified and forthright bearing, his eyes and hand rested on the place with confidence in his superiors for a year and a half.

"Look here, Guy," repeated the young station agent, drawing his friend across the street.

"Do you see what that fellow's doing?" In the center of the crowd was a dark-skinned, evil-smelling fellow, dressed in a tattered and dirty garb, and altogether presenting a most repellent appearance. As Guy and Edgar approached, the fellow appeared to be heaving something which lay at his feet, with a short, hoarse cry, just as they reached the outer edge of the crowd the fragment of the exclamation made its appearance.

"A bear upon my tail!" cried they. "A dancing bear!"

"He doesn't look much like dancing," Edgar rejoined. "Look at the poor beast. He's almost half starved and looks as though he had traveled through Virginia mud for a month."

The bear was a mangy-looking beast indeed and it looked for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals people. He was a heavy fellow about six feet high with a thick coat of skin, the neck being held by the collar.

Having got upon his feet, as a matter of fact a clown from the men, the bear commenced a slow and solemn march toward the crowd, which was prevented to be a distance. The clown tried him to make him go faster, but the patient creature behind the hand of his steersman staggered on through the throng.

Edgar showed his way to the front of the crowd.

"Look here, you," he said, addressing the clown. "You ought to be prosecuted for beating this animal so, and by George! If I do it myself I'll show him around here. Take him where you make him dance. The poor beast had better be shot if you can't afford to beat him."

"You should Garibaldi, I should say," cried the man, shaking his fist vigorously at the young man.

"Come, my man, there's no way to talk you out here," he assured Edgar heartily. "If you want to keep Garibaldi, as you call him, give him a good square meal. Otherwise, I assure you, you'll have to pay a fine."

"That is so, Thompson," explained a gentleman who had just come up. "The man ought to be arrested for mistreating the animal that way. Any way, a half-starved bear is a nuisance to life and there was the possibility of it all about the fellow and have him sent out."

They had reached the station now and Edgar went inside. Guy's train was already made up and waiting for a train from New York on the main line to arrive.

As Guy I can't sleep down at the station any longer."

"You'll scrape this room with me, of course," Guy declared. "It's made it all right with Mrs. Westman."

"Thank you, old man. Well, to-morrow! One might think that I ought to hear anything that went on in the latest office right through my own door. I'm sure the Division superintendent said, and that's the reason he suspended me. It doesn't take much to suspend a fellow on this road, by the way."

"Yes, I know, Guy."

"Well, I didn't hear anything during the night, and this morning when I entered the ticket office the drawer was open and the cash cleared out—every copper. About a hundred and sixty dollars, for I had a big job yesterday. I've asked headquarters some after time to give me a note, but they've put me off and now it's gone to the dogs."

"Well, how did the burglars get in?" Guy demanded.

"That's what troubles me," returned Edgar.

"First I thought that the scound, whoever he was, crawled through the small window over the water tank of the main waiting room, and then got into the ticket office through the window over the door, but when I suggested that to headquarters, perhaps he got in through the door and showed me that it must have been a pretty small and very supple man who did it. A month or more ago I saw such a thing, but not a man, he said, well, I did see footprints on the wall as though somebody had climbed up."

"And you haven't any idea as to who it might have been?"

"Not the least."

"Didn't you see any suspicious characters hanging about during the evening, as the newspapers say?" inquired Guy, who seemed to possess the instincts of a "born detective."

"No, you I did, too, though," and Edgar laughed. "You remember that little fellow with the shaven head, Garibaldi? You know he wanted to 'show me' but telling him to give the poor beast a drink. I saw him hanging round the station early in the evening and when he came up to the ticket office window and shook his fist at me, he had been drinking and I had noticed and him about his business."

"The little fellow," returned Guy. "Now you're all right, Ed. That chap was a pretty smart fellow even for a Italian. He could crawl through the window if anybody could."

"By George! I believe you're right, Guy," Edgar exclaimed. "I'll tell your superiors in the Division and try to have him sent up the fellow. I can give him a pretty accurate description. I wonder whether he was sent to the jail or not. I didn't hear it with this what he was around the station last night."

THE ANIMAL OBJECTED MOMENTARILY AT LEAVING THE GRASSY OF THE TRAIL.

property. You'd better move along, my man."

The Italian, seeing that the crowd from whom he had hoped to obtain a few tickets, was going with Edgar, ordered the bear down and pulled him along the street, shattering a valley of stones upon the young man's head.

"Garibaldi will drop dead some day, if he isn't introduced to a meat of victim," said Edgar with a laugh, joining his friend. "Look here the bear upon those recognitions who are following him. I'll bet he's thinking how plump and juicy they are. It would be dangerous for 'Old Massimo' to let go of that coat."

"Old Massimo! as you call him, would he be to catch a knife into you, old man," returned Guy. "I saw it in his eye."

"You could see almost anything wicked in that fellow's eye, if you looked sharp," said Edgar. "But I'm not greatly worried. If I see Parson (Mr.

Parson) before he pulled out. His cap to the burglar's scoundrel four hours. Then there was a wait of an hour and he came back as haggard as the night express, reaching Kenton about two o'clock."

Guy scarcely slept, and the middle of the forenoon, and therefore upon the following day was the last person to know in Kenton to have the least and most startling bit of news. He had only told him about it at breakfast. The railroad station had been broken into and the main drawer robbed of a considerable sum of money. In addition, and this surprised and worried Guy a great deal, was, Edgar Thompson had been suspended pending an investigation of the matter.

Edgar had a room fixed up over the ticket office in which he had always kept since obtaining the position of agent, but he took his meals at the same boarding house as Guy, and when he appeared for dinner shortly after, Guy hurried him up into his room and demanded a full account of the affair.

"Well, I have no little about it myself, but I can't tell you much, Guy," he said, with a nervous laugh. "You know where I sleep—and, by the way, I'll bet you see Mrs. Westman about a note and the matter is cleared up, for if

COLLEGE LIFE IS BEGUN.

THE large examination room in Burke Hall was filled with young men seated at separate small tables, bending over their examination papers and scribbling furiously. They were all applicants for admission to Belmont College, and this was the last of the fall examinations—the examination in Latin. At one of the tables near the back of the room sat a boy in a gray suit, peering away at his paper, apparently quite oblivious to his surroundings.

The big room, brightly lighted by the warm rays of a September sun, the platform, where a white-haired, pleasant-faced professor sat silent and wrote the notes and preceptor peering up and down the aisles between the tables, watching the students carefully; and the many scribbles about him—all these had deeply impressed the boy in gray at first, but he had soon forgotten everything else in his work, and was now bent at it, translating a selection from Cicero. He observed now and then that he had just even folded a pair of eyes that had been steadily bent on his examination paper almost from the start. A boy seated at the desk just across the aisle from him, noticing how fully he answered the questions, had kept a shy watch on his paper, and followed his writing closely whenever his watchful looks were turned.

As the boy in gray finished a page and missed it over to start in on the next, he heard a low whispered exclamation.

"How there—wait a minute!"

He stopped writing and looked up. As he did, his neighbor across the aisle crumpled up a piece of paper in his hand and gave it a little toss. It dropped exactly into the lap of the boy in gray. The latter looked down at it a moment in surprise, then picked it up and opened it.

The following lines were written in small print letters:

"Please turn back your last page a minute. I am ripping off your translation. I don't know the solution on the examination paper, and I'll be crumpled if you don't help me."

The boy in gray looked up. Each student signed a pledge at the head of his examination paper that his answers were honestly given, without help from any one.

The boy in gray turned and looked at his neighbor steadily in the face for about a minute. The latter never winked, but stared coolly back. The boy in gray then crumpled the paper up again, and, with a gesture of contempt, threw it back beneath his neighbor's desk. A moment later one of the watchmen came down the aisle, and the boy in gray settled down to work.

Only a half page more remained, so it was scarcely three minutes later when he rose, folded up his examination paper, and walking up to the platform, laid it on the desk. He was free. His last examination was over. He left the room, and going down stairs with a light step, found a boy about his own age awaiting him at the entrance.

CHAPTER I.

COMMENCEMENT DAY.

It was opening-day of the spring term of school in Blarrier No. 1, Mill City, and all the boys and girls of the district came trooping up to the brick schoolhouse as the new bell in the little tower, pealed forth its summons.

Jonah Quigley stood in the door and watched the pupils as they filed in and took their seats, a half-dozened back on the faces of some, while others were that restless air of defiance sent only upon the countenance of scholars who are determined not to obey.

And Jonah himself did not seem wholly at ease as he turned to follow the scholars into the large, low-ceiled room, where for years he had held sway, as at least was supposed to hold sway over the rising generation in that portion of the little hamlet.

But his eyes had been more much on than elsewhere, the youngsters looking it about all their own way, as a general thing, up to the present year, when a radical change had taken place in many respects.

First, the name of the town had been changed from Blarrier to Mill City, in consequence of a large factory having been erected, which gave employment to a great number of hands and promised to materially increase the wealth and prosperity of the village.

Second, the superintending school committee of three had been superseded by a supervised school, and this latter individual had declared his intention of seeing that a different order of things should prevail in regard to school affairs. In future, books would have to be learned, rules of paper and other matters could no longer be thrown about the room promiscuously, and worse than of this, a certain degree of decorum must be maintained, meaning to and from school.

But neither had been given of these intended improvements, and Mr. Quigley was made to understand that his continuance as instructor would depend entirely upon his assent to carrying out the proposed changes.

"A pretty how-do-you-do," said Quigley Stanton, son of the senior member of the firm of Stanton & Green, owners of the big mill, as he stood surrounded by a crowd of school-boys, just as the brass knocker of the bell began to sound the call. "They are going to make regular Stone Prison out of us. We've always been allowed to do as we please hereabouts, but now, according to this educational supervision, we are to be placed as the case is."

Quigley glanced around at his companions as much as to say, "Well, boys, how do you like it?" After a short silence he continued:

"And then this matter of being made orderly going to and from school. It's absolutely outrageous. I guess old Jonas'll have his hands full."

He thrust his hands deep in the pockets of his coat, and strode toward the door of the school house, followed by his half-dozen faithful adherents.

"You'll make 'em cry, Quigley, see if you don't," said one of the boys, as they passed the door and young Stanton turned on his sharply.

"Be careful how you better our plans," he said, with a withering look, and the boy started back abashed.

"All good morning, Master Stanton," said the teacher, to which Quigley replied with a wave of the hand.

"Yes, I've learned all about them," and he entered the school room and glanced about with an air of conscious superiority. The scholars were all in their places, and still the bell continued to ring. Suddenly Mr. Quigley seemed to remember some forgotten thing, for he opened a small door and called sharply:

"There, that will do! Don't ring the tongue out of the bell."

A white man rose from the door, but it was quickly silenced by the voice of Mr. Quigley.

"The school will please come to order. Open your eyes and ears."

The boy who had excited Quigley's ire, returned promptly, walked to the end designated, a book on his breast and a glass in his brown arm as he turned them in the direction of young Stanton.

His appearance was so slight, certainly to attract attention. Although not more than fourteen years of age, his clothing was that of a man, the shirt and sleeves of his coat being somewhat abbreviated, and the legs of his pantaloons pulled up all their way to the respective thighs.

Jonah Quigley stood upon the platform and glanced around over the assemblage of boys and girls, for perhaps half a minute before he spoke again. Then he said in a somewhat hesitating tone of voice:

"My dear people, for some reason unknown to me, the people of Mill City is divided regarding the fact that we have been to inaugurate a new era in school affairs, and the scholars in this building will be to a great extent, the care of the superintending school—Mr. Green. I shall provide every one with a certain amount of his wisdom, which is good measure, and, finally, attendance, close application to studies, general conduct, and above all, good deportment. This latter includes orderly behavior while on your way to and from school."

"Good for Quigley," said Quigley in a low tone, "I expect we'll not remain down pretty long."

A sharp rap sounded upon the door, and the teacher went at once to answer it.

As he did so, Quigley Stanton, who sat only a few seats away from the strange looking boy with the white clothing, took a keen glance from his pocket, viewed it and looking forward towards the chair point to the work of the day.

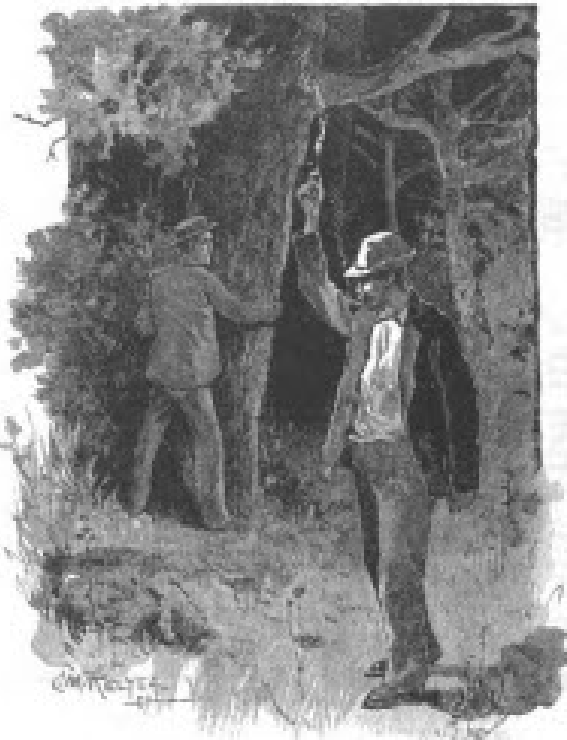

The last, when Mr. Quigley had called upon, returned no word, though he shrunk away from the stool. Like a flash he whirled around, seized Quigley by the wrist and with a violent gesture that room quivered in their shock with pain, while the latter's hands were dropped from his nervous fingers to the floor.

"Oh, murdered! Am my hand. You've broken my wrist," he uttered anything about in his efforts to break away.

"Boys, I'm astonished," cried the stern voice of Mr. Quigley, and not till then did the boy realize his fault, as Quigley, who shrunk back to his seat again without a word.

At this Quigley stopped and picked up the book from the floor.

"Now, Mr. Green," said the teacher to a gentleman who accompanied him, "you will perceive that I have some difficult things to deal with, though I have in line in being them into proper regulation. This boy, who has just behaved so badly, is the child of a poor widow, and I hope you will look leniently upon his transgressions. His mother is obliged to work even beyond her strength in her efforts to keep her family of three children together."

HE HESITED THE THREE THINK MORE CAREFUL, BUT WAS AFRAID TO MOVE.

said Mr. Quigley, as Quigley approached, "I had to have you with us once more, though I fear that you will find the school here much different from the one you attended last year in the city."

He rubbed his hands and bowed, a dejected smile upon his face as he spoke, and the rich man's own replied nervously: "Oh, some different, I expect, but there is some freedom here. A city school is so much like a military camp for me. I have been homesick for the old free and easy since I have had here."

"Of course, you are aware of the new order of things which go into effect to-immediately the sound of the bell rang, and a boy's form appeared in the narrow doorway.

"You told me to ring till you said stop," said the boy steadily, a disheveled look in his dark eyes. "How did I know when you told me?"

"Oh, well, you know now," answered Mr. Quigley. "Go in and take your seat."

As the boy entered the school room he met the gaze of Quigley Stanton and again his.

"Stanton of Stanton?" exclaimed Quigley in an indignant whisper. "From whence comes that?"

CHAPTER I.

A SHOT IN THE DARK.

"HOW do you suppose it came from, Max?"

"Somebody dropped it, of course." "But people are not going about dropping Winchester rifles on the ground and leaving them to come back after them."

"Maybe the fellow couldn't come back, look there," and Maxwell fairly pointed his finger in the rocks that suddenly seemed at the very feet of the two men as they moved on a road of red beyond the spot where Albert Hall had stumbled over the rifle.

"Why, that's a regular eye, isn't it?" exclaimed the latter. "I never knew there was anything of the sort around Haverstone."

"We've never explored the woods as deeply as we have this afternoon," returned Max. "But I say, Al, doesn't there seem to be some connection in your mind between this hole in the ground and that abandoned gun?"

"It does look as though there could be made to fit two such stones as this one, Max. This one is fractured the least particle. It can't have been here very long."

"In that case you'd better drop it, my boy. You don't want to be defendant in a case of misappropriated property."

"But what's the good of leaving it out here to be raised by the neighbors?"

"It won't be raised by the neighbors if the owner comes back for it in five minutes."

"Then you think the owner's in the area?"

"He may be."

"If he is, he'll never come out again."

"What do you mean, Al?"

"Simple that he wouldn't want to stay in a place like that without his gun, unless he couldn't help himself."

"You think he's been killed, then?"

"That or seriously injured. In any case, we ought to investigate and find out."

"Do you mean that we ought to explore the cavern, Al?"

"Certainly. I should think you'd want to do that any way, out of simple curiosity."

"Excuse me. Now that I come to consider it, it looks considerably like a bear's den."

"So much the more reason why we should venture in and secure the chap that may be imprisoned there."

"But who'll come in and rescue us?"

"This that goes in with us," and Al pulled the rifle he had placed across his shoulder.

"But it's as dark as a pocket in there. How are you going to see anything after we get inside?"

"Maxwell, you could see a splendid sunset at the foot of some conservative crag as the Bluebeards of the far-forevering. We'll let our finger tips be the light for us in this occasion, and feel our way."

"Well," laughed Max, drawing to his hands and knees, "if there's to be any making up of seeing and feeling, it will probably be the eye work of his headlight that will come out the top of the hole, but what's about it?" and he started rapidly in at the mouth of the aperture.

Al brought him by the leg.

"Don't be reckless, Max," he said. "Remember you haven't seen the World's Fair yet and I know you don't want to miss that. Let me go first with the gun."

Now that he had made out his readiness to be a pioneer, Max willingly looked out and took second place.

"Is that thing loaded?" he inquired as Al reached into the darkness ahead, dragging the rifle after him.

The two boys shone to each other in a sort of daze of terror for a second.

"Did you hear that noise, Max?" then said Al.

"Just do you suppose anybody was hit?"

"I'm afraid so. We must find out at once."

"I wish we had a light."

"Hush, I'm going to call. Hello there in the cave! Somebody hurt?"

No answer. Not even another groan.

"I'm sure I heard something like a cry, just after the gun went off, aren't you, Max?"

"Positive."

"Perhaps whoever it is is dead by this he says, it was pure accident, but the possibility of even such a thing was appalling.

On and on they crept into the cave. Al stopped at frequent intervals and called up, but there was never any response.

Finally his hand struck something that was neither rock nor moss. He started and drew back for an instant. He had come upon the object of his search—a human form.

"I've found him," he said softly to Max.

"Oh, I wish I had a light."

"Maybe he's got a match in his pocket," suggested Max. "Is he alive?"

"I don't know yet."

Slowly Al passed his hands up the trousers which he had touched, then, on to the waistcoat, then the match chain and then stopped.

A great wave of relief went over him. The heart was beating.

"He's breathing," he said to Max. "I'll see if I can find a match about his clothes."

He began to rummage carefully in the vest pocket of the unknown one, and soon a glad "hello!" that escaped him then told his companions that he had been successful.

The match was quickly struck, and after stumbling the two boys with his hand for an instant, Al held it up over the prostrate figure.

A ray of alarm crossed him. The first thing he saw was a little pool of blood on the floor of the cave.

But he was somewhat reassured when the whitened glint of the flame brought into his field of vision the face of the stranger.

His eyes were open, and he was looking at the two boys with an interested attentiveness that he could not have mistaken had his wound been a serious one.

He was a handsome fellow, with light hair and brown eyes, and was well dressed.

His first words, however, were not calculated to make permanent the relief of mind Al experienced.

"Well," he said, raising a weak shiver shivering with blood. "I hope you are satisfied with your work."

CHAPTER II.

A VERY CURIOUS WREATH.

"ARE you any better, my boy?"

"I—"

Al was so astonished at the time in which the other had made his remark that he had some difficulty in collecting himself sufficiently to reply.

"Can't you see I'm hurt?" demanded the fellow roughly, shaking the stream from which the blood was flowing almost in Al's face. Then the match went out, and in that darkness that seemed to fall around them, nobody said a word for a minute.

"I don't believe he's wounded badly at all," Max whispered to Al.

"If he was hurt he too sick to talk that way."

"But he's wounded all the same," returned Al, "and I did it. I want to do what I can for him."

The stranger seemed quite ready to meet this offer of assistance half way.

"Here do not presume to settle this thing," he now demanded.

"If you will let us help you outside I will get a doctor and do all I can for you."

"I SAY, AL, I DON'T THINK WE'D BE WISE CONNECTING IN YOUR MIND BETWEEN THIS POOL IN THE GROUND AND THAT ABANDONED GUN!"

"Yes, indeed. I made sure of that before I started in."

"Well then, to save you from it, I pointed away from your broken friend. It wouldn't take much of a job against one of those sharp pointed rocks to start that fellow, would it?"

As though Max's words had been prophetic, there was at that instant a tremendous explosion. It seemed as if the very walls of the cavern were crashing in upon them.

Then, as the echoes of this first dreadful sound died away, a more awful one succeeded it: the groan of some human being in pain.

It came from the innermost recesses of the cave, and as he heard it, Albert Hall's heart almost still for an instant. Had the gun he carried killed some one when it went off?

For just that which Max feared, had happened. The trigger had struck against some projection among the rocks, and been caught.

Then, went on Al in a tremulous voice, and if Max could have beheld his face he would have seen that it was white.

"No, no," cried Max earnestly. "If can't be. He has only fainted."

"We must push on and see. I'll leave this unconscious gun behind. Be careful of it as you pass, Max. It's on the right."

The two boys moved forward into the depths of the cavern, from solitary ingulges at the hearts of each, for they were such fast friends that what threatened the peace of mind of one was a weight upon the spirit of the other.

How suddenly the atmosphere of the summer afternoon had been changed for them! Starting out from their houses for a farewell stroll through the countryside before starting West together, on a trip to the World's Fair that had been the goal of their hopes ever since spring, they had been so joyous, so merry, so carefree as one is apt to see only that day went off a moment ago.

Had Albert killed a fellow going? To A Bad Lot.

BY ARTHUR LEE PUTNAM,
Author of "The Doctor," "Just Opposite Brooklyn," "The Doctor," etc.

CHAPTER I.

BERNARD'S ROOM.

"YOU'RE a bad lot, Bernard Barlow. I don't think I ever knew a worse lot."

"Thank you for the compliment, Mr. Barlow. Last messenger between, that was in healthy company, wasn't it?"

The speaker was fifteen years of age, but as tall as most boys of seventeen. He had a bold, aggressive manner, which he only assumed with those he thought were hostile or unfriendly.

He could be a devoted friend, and a loyal subordinate to one who gained his good will. Mr. Barlow did not look upon it as a friend, though he had been placed in his charge two months before by a cousin of his deceased father.

Barlow Barlow, a man of average size, tall and with sloping shoulders, colored with anger at the boy's insolent words. He seemed to have been educated at a small Western college, and on the strength of it had established himself in the country and afterwards for private pupils at a low rate.

There were mostly young, and not uneducated in any of his children, but Bernard was old enough and well enough educated to perceive and comment on them. This greatly annoyed and angered Mr. Barlow, who felt that the boy did not treat him with proper respect.

"Quite your independence," said Barlow with a vicious look in his greenish head eyes. "I don't need to tell you from a whisper whisper like you."

"I intended it for your benefit, Mr. Barlow," said Bernard sharply. "Besides, you criticize me. You called me a bad lot."

"And so you are. A worse—a worse lot I never saw."

"How would he know, Mr. Barlow?"

"Using such words better look out, I won't permit to your aggressive insolence. Besides, you are ignorant of the fact that Chas. and I were once a couple of the best of friends."

"Thank you for the information, Mr. Barlow. I did not know that you had such high authority. I have read a little of Chas. and I know, and I know the word you mean."

"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing," remarked Mr. Barlow with dignity.

"I am sure you are a good judge on that point, Mr. Barlow," said Bernard with a sneer. "You know how to do it, so that his side did not catch the worst meaning."

"I am glad you give me credit for something," remarked the teacher. "Don't you hear what I say, I won't have you quarrel with that old baron, as you did last evening."

"What's the matter with that baron?"

"He was once a pupil of mine, and he detested authority, so I had to discharge him."

"That isn't what he says, Mr. Barlow."

"What does he say?"

"He says that he found out you didn't know enough to teach him, and got his father to take him away from your school."

"Then the lot that," said Mr. Barlow, coloring deeply. "I'd like to teach him."

"I dare say you would, Mr. Barlow, but I don't think it would be exactly safe. But wouldn't stand it?"

"He'd have to stand it, if I took it into my head to discharge him."

"It is because he has poisoned his father's mind against me by tales and mendacious charges and statements. I am obliged to look upon him with contempt, and my alma mater bestowed upon me the honorary degree of B. S. at the last commencement."

"What does B. S. stand for?"

"Doctor of Philosophy," answered Mr. Barlow in a lofty tone.

"Oh, I thought it might mean something else."

"What?" asked Mr. Barlow suspiciously.

"I'M AFTER YOU, BERNARD BARLOW," SAID MR. BARLOW GRIMLY.

"If you had a nightmare, I'd bet on you," said the boy.

"Do you consider nightmare a criminal word?" asked Mr. Barlow with a sneer.

"Well, not exactly. I suppose you know that Dyer was it," said Bernard with a bold flight of imagination.

Now Mr. Barlow was not sufficiently versed in English classical writers to know whether this statement was correct or not. So he compromised, to conceal his ignorance.

"Dyer is not always a correct writer," he added. "I never advise my pupils to imitate him. But that is nothing here now, then. I have told you that I don't want you to go round with that baron."

"Why not? I am sure he is of good family. His father is a physician."

"It is from respect to his father that I did not discharge him when he was in my school."

"He says his father does not think much of your scholarship."

"Oh, is that material. I don't want to display my ignorance," said Bernard meekly.

"I am glad you are becoming sensible."

Mr. Barlow did not press the question as he conjectured that F. B. understood by Bernard, would stand for something from some money.

"I am going to the post office, Mr. Barlow. Can I do anything for you?"

"You may inquire if there are any letters for me."

"All right, sir."

Bernard was about to leave the room, when he turned as if struck by a sudden thought.

"Mr. Barlow," he said, "what authority you have for calling me a bad lot?"

"I have the authority of Cornelius McGurk, your guardian."

"Does he say I am a bad lot?" asked Bernard, his brow contracting.

"Yes he did."

"When did he say it?"

"In a letter I received only last week."

"May I see the letter, Mr. Barlow?"

"Yes," answered the teacher. "If it will give you any satisfaction."

"It will give me satisfaction to know exactly how he expresses himself in speaking of me."

Barlow opened his desk, and took out a letter postmarked New York.

"There is the letter," he said, handing it to Bernard with a malicious smile.

Out of regard for your feelings I had not intended to show it to you, but since you desire it, I feel that I shall not be responsible for any wound your pride may receive."

Bernard did not master this speech, but taking the letter he opened it and hastily read it.

This was the letter:

Frank Barlow, Esq.

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of your letter, containing a copy of my word Bernard Barlow.

You say you find him disrespectful and disobedient, and from this you ask me to increase the price I pay for his education.

I am glad to hear that he is a bad lot. You will do me the justice to realize that I am not under your charge. I did not wish to increase the boy's debts.

I find you that he was obedient, respectful and kind. You told me that you had had great success in managing my boys, and were willing to undertake him.

Under these circumstances I cannot feel that I am called upon to increase the price.

Nothing came upon me before, as in the first place, should you find him obedient, I shall not object to your retaining him under my care.

I am, however, very sorry to hear that he is a bad lot. I am sorry to hear that he is a bad lot. I am sorry to hear that he is a bad lot.

I am, however, very sorry to hear that he is a bad lot. I am sorry to hear that he is a bad lot. I am sorry to hear that he is a bad lot.

Kit Cummings' Sloop.

BY CHARLES F. WELLES.

CHAPTER I.

THUNDER AND SUN STORM.

It was a cool, bright day in May and the pretty party that had gathered on a romantic rocky spot on the Connecticut shore of Long Island Sound, were having a merry time.

The rocky coast curved inward, forming a beautiful little inlet, while above and back were wooded hills and dark ravines.

The dinner hour was past; the rambles were over and the crowd wandered about seeking amusement in fishing, sailing, playing games or in picking the wild flowers that bedecked the woods.

In a cool, shady spot overlooking the water that bent angrily against the rocks below, sat a middle-aged gentleman and his wife, on a rustic seat.

From their position they could look down upon the Sound's broad expanse of flushing waters, and below them to their left, the rock-bound inlet, constantly entered by dozens of incoming and outgoing sailing craft.

"The boat owners are doing a good business today," remarked the gentleman, glancing down at a couple of small vessels that were gliding out at the harbor.

"And especially the owner of the one ahead," answered the lady. "People seem anxious to avoid him if as soon as it returns from each trip. And I do not wonder. It is by far the handsomest of them all," and she gazed admiringly at a small, beautifully modeled sloop, whose bow, arched, shining hull, and large spread of snow-white canvas, proclaimed her to be new and swift.

"Yes, I have been watching that craft myself, and am glad to see so many good points about her which for fifteen years old skipper knows as well how to bring out."

"Only fifteen?" exclaimed his wife, in surprise. "And mistaking a boat like that? But people seem to have confidence in him."

"And well they may, as he is a thorough sailor, having learned under his father, Jack Cummings, the fisherman, who was drowned not long ago. He loves the water and will doubtless take to the sea, some day and eventually become a splendid officer. He lives in his father's old shanty on the shore not far from Waterson, and makes a pretty good income during the summer by taking out sailing parties."

Now that the lady knew that the boat she had so admired was owned and run by an earnest boy who was making his own way in the world, she gazed after it with increased interest.

Quickly it had left the shore behind, and was rapidly cutting through the white capped waves, leaving only a thin strong line.

Suddenly it drew away until its big masthead was but a tiny patch of white on the horizon. Above the white spot increased in size. The boat was returning.

In a short time it was again beating into the harbor.

"Don't you, Edward," said the lady. "That boat and her owner have interested me. I should like to see both."

"Certainly. We will return to Waterson on the sloop if you like."

They arose, and descending a winding path were soon on the shore below.

"I would be glad to have you," replied Kit.

"May, shall we go aboard?"

"Yes."

He took her arm to help her, then stopped and looked at her in astonishment.

"Why you are beautiful!" said he in surprise. "If you are afraid we will take the steamer home."

"No, I am not afraid," she replied.

"A careless observer, to see her anchored, would say she carried too much sail," muttered Mr. Allen, glancing at the mass of canvas above the mast, and at the blue pennant that stood out horizontally from the shroud and towering masthead, "but the way she heels along now shows that she can carry all she has. Sails set, points well, and runs along like a race horse."

"KIT, YOU ARE THAT GOOD-BEAT BOAT! SHALL THERE BE THAT TO LOOK OUT FOR YOU YET, YOU ARE SIXTEEN."

"That boy understands his business," admiringly said the gentleman, as he and his wife stood by the water's edge and watched the boat beat into the harbor. "An old skipper could not do better."

Straight for the spot where they were gazed the sloop, her outboard parties in stroke the quiet waters of the miniature harbor.

The boat was made fast and the sailing party disembarked.

Everything about the sloop was new, clean and trim. A well-built boy in a blue working costume turned a handsome face up to the gentleman as the latter said cheerily, "Well, Kit, how are you?"

"Thriving," replied the boy. "I have been doing a raking business all day."

"I should judge so, as your ship is never out of town. Will you take us back to Waterson? The afternoon is driving in a clean and I should like to see how business sails."

though she was trembling, and seemed strangely satisfied. "That face!"

"Whose face? That about it?"

"His. That boy's. He is the very image of—"

but never again. It is too foolish to talk about. Yes, we will go aboard," and recovering her equanimity she stepped on the sloop's deck.

Though Kit saw it all and wondered much, he appeared to notice nothing, but bowed himself in greeting under way.

A strong gust sent the boat outward, and as the wind filled her sails her head dipped in the brine and she rapidly increased her speed until the water bowed about the bow.

Mr. Allen sat with both hands resting on the top of a well-headed cane, which sprang between his knees, and gazed steadily but with a critical air at the sloop, her sails and her trim.

Kit was watching the 26, and Mr. Allen, glancing at his wife, saw she was watching the young skipper with an earnest and almost wild look.

Checking her husband's eye she looked close to him and whispered, as she read his questioning expression, "I do not know why it is but this boy's face impresses me strongly."

Mr. Allen, wondering at his wife's "whim" as he mentally termed it, continued the boy more closely.

He saw nothing to arouse any emotion in himself, simply a well-built young fellow with a frank countenance, and regular features, broadened by exposure to the sea breeze.

"He is out of the common run in intelligence," thought Mr. Allen. "I saw that when I first saw him," and so he turned his attention to the ship again.

Not on his wife.

"My boy," said she suddenly, "was Mr. Cummings, when you first with said his death, really your father?"

A Desertion From the Ranks.

BY ROBERT C. THOMAS.

BEHIND the rows of tents, pitched upon the level plateau at the west end of Barro Colorado Island, in the shade of the pine groves, were grouped eight or ten boys, most of the oldest and largest in the school, though, as the fathers of the Barro Colorado Academy would have told you, among them were some of the most mischievous, not to say malicious spirits in the whole camp and file.

In gathering two hundred boys together, it is utterly impossible to have the number entirely free from bullies and the maliciously inclined; but in an institution ruled as strictly as was Barro Colorado, the turbulent spirits found few opportunities to make trouble. This was the occasion of the annual camp, however, and with a smaller number of boys, and the older boys mostly to command, things had not been going so smoothly during the week which had been spent upon the island. With Colonel Allen away, and most of the senior teachers remaining at the Academy, the boys were rather disrespectful, and this year several of the "hard set" were among the list of senior officers and things were worse than usual.

Hugh Dargun was stationed abroad for the term, having asked the permission to share hard work at his father's and also studying the character of boys among the forestmen never would have guessed it for him, nor was he strong enough for the other boys to have assumed their voice had it not been for his underhand tricks.

It was of a halfling, overhauling disposition, especially with the younger boys, and without doubt some of the senior officers feared him. He was a big, strapping fellow, with an only pork mark of face, and a hot like a hammer as many of the boys could testify.

He enjoyed at a great many of the pranks played that week by the fellows, and there was little doubt in the fathers' minds that he often had a part in them himself; but how to prove the assertion was another matter. Mr. Allison, a young, mild, unassuming fellow, who usually was charged with driving during the school year, seemed to have been stung out by the "hard set" as a bait for much of their horseplay. Mr. Allison was never harsh, and had always been exceptionally kind to the boys; but this did not save him.

He was a different person, who, though he was an excellent disciplinarian, could never stand up before his scholars and explain a figure on the board, without blushing like a girl, and stammering and trembling, with symptoms of stage fright. Further, Mr. Allison had a thin, feeble voice, was weak and sickly looking, and wore sunglasses to shield a pair of very weak and near-sighted eyes. More than enough peculiarities there, you see, to make him the best of his pupils' practical jokes.

Once during the term, Mr. Allison received a visit from his old mother, as peculiar and weird looking as himself, and the father had had named themselves by making an open inn as they shared of the poor old creature, and caricaturing her on the blackboard. That the drawing master loved and respected his aged parent there could be no doubt, and he was most tender of her while she remained. She lived alone in a little town not more than twenty miles away, yet his duties were so crushing that it was seldom that he could get home to go home.

The school and all of the senior teachers being away, Mr. Allison had had an exceptionally hard time of it during the camp. The night before some of the dissentiously mean to his skepticism; "but he hasn't raised a rib. Kind of knocks the wind out of our sails."

"I'd like to take it down and parade it up and down before the tent," said Neal Murray. "It looks queer enough like him to feel his mother. If I do say it myself."

"Be careful! let's play a joke on the old lady. What will you old Douglas child, cricket! Hark! forgetting the dignity of his position and becoming animated."

"What sort of a joke?" asked Harry, doubtfully.

Dargun lowered his voice.

"It doesn't strike me at all," responded Harry, before the others could speak. "That's the moment thing I ever heard of, and I for one, won't have anything to do with it."

"Well, now, what's the matter with you?" Dargun asked in surprise, looking up fully at Harry's words.

"There's nothing the matter with me," returned young Conklin. "It's this kind of yours that's the matter. It's an outrageous thing to do, and besides, it might lead to serious results. The old lady, so Douglas says, has got heart trouble, and if we should send her such a telegram she might never recover from it. If she should should tell her what would we be?"

"Why, we would be students of the Barro Colorado Academy, of course," exclaimed Dargun, with a coarse laugh. "What's the use of going into horrors over it? Don't discuss nothing! I guess if she's had heart trouble all her life and it hasn't killed her yet, this won't harm her."

"Well, I won't have anything to do with it, and I advise you to let the whole thing alone," declared Harry, looking away.

There may have been others in the crowd who felt that Harry was right; but they dared not openly oppose Dargun as Harry had, and some of them even joined their other companion in looking at Harry as he departed.

"Hilksop!" Dargun exclaimed in disgust. "He deserves a good flogging and he'll get it too."

"Perhaps he'll make," suggested some one, timidly. "If he should, it would get an ink as end of a row."

"He wouldn't dare," Dargun declared. "The whole school would back him up."

"He wouldn't say any way; he isn't that kind of a fellow," said Neal Murray quietly.

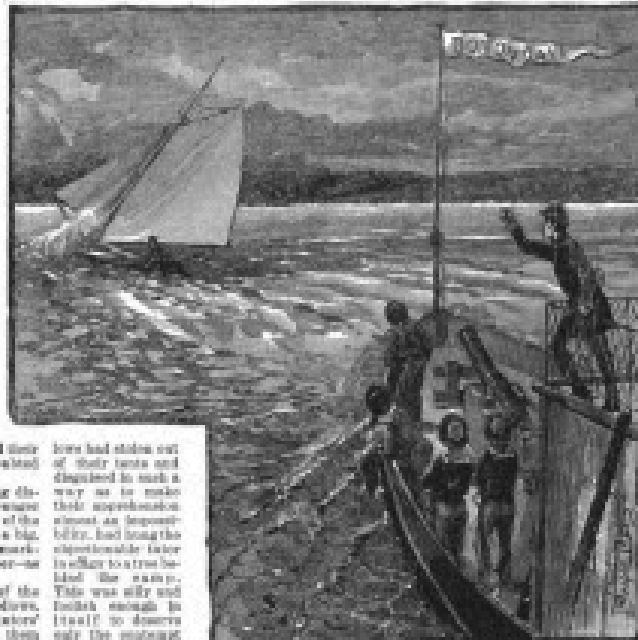

But Harry was terribly tempted to give Mr. Allison a hint of the plot which Dargun and his friends were arranging; yet that was bound rule of honor, which all boys secretly obey, and which never often does it them good in the keeping, kept him from carrying the plan.

He did not try again to persuade the others from committing the distinctly trick, for they were all ahead of Dargun and would do his bidding.

As was these who were in the plot met for another conference in the afternoon, he knew when they left their tents at night, secured the village, and bore it to the little slope, and he was sure, when he heard Neal Murray and Fred Angel ordered to go to Conklin for supplies in the store, that Dargun had not given up his plan of sending the letter to Mr. Allison's mother.

Neal and Fred went to go immediately after the letter. The letter was all ready to push off, and within he did something good. Harry knew that it would be too late.

boys had stolen out of their tents and disguised in such a way as to make their apprehension almost an impossibility, had brought the objectionable letter in order to try to behind the camp.

This was silly and foolish enough in itself to deserve only the contempt Mr. Allison showed for it, but he did not even under his sarcasm, cut down, and left it dangling from the tree branch in a rather ghastly way, did not see that it was stuffed with hay.

The tale of the danger, however, had been painted by Neal Murray, the eldest of the school, to bear a very strong resemblance in the young tales, for the mark had been used by the boys in some of the stunts during the Academy during the previous winter, and the figure appeared very lifelike.

It was an "off hour" now, and the group of boys back of the tent, Hugh Dargun among them, were talking over the rather disappointing effect of the "hard set" of the night before.

"I thought he would be wild," declared Harry Conklin, who, although he often had a part in the mischievous doings of the "hard set," was by no means violently inclined, being more thoughtful than in-

"You know that but the new rifle came to? It looks just like a coffin. We'll cheer it" with a jerk of his thumb toward the village. "Into the tent, put in enough weight in it to seem like a real body, and up the tent and stick it in the old lady. Ha, ha! won't she be wakened?"

They sent a telegram, too, announcing Old Douglas's demise and telling her to meet the body at the railroad station. They were going to send somebody over to town for some supplies in the little tomorrow morning, and I'll see that they're the right fellows," and he winked knowingly. "We'll cut it down tonight and get it stored in the tent. I'll write the telegram, and whoever goes to town can send it up to the office by a boy and send the letter to the station by an expressman; get somebody who you know won't squeak, of course. Now, how does that strike you?"

CHAPTER I.

RALPH STARTS ON AN EVENTFUL JOURNEY.

It was raining hard. Ralph Walpole thought he had never heard so dismal a sound as the pattering of the storm on the roof of the station.

And then Ralph was in a mood to be easily made dismal. He was waiting for the train to come and carry him away from a town where there was nobody left to take care of him, and that this to another where he was to present himself at the home of a man he had never seen.

Little wonder that that Ralph felt blue, especially as his train was over an hour late and it was late October now. The few who had come to see him off had long since gone home and to bed. The ticket window had been closed. There was no one about the station except himself.

Looking out through the window up the track in the direction whence his train would come, Ralph noticed a pair of light trails into the darkness.

"Ah, here!" he cried with a great sigh of relief, and hurried to the door, where he stood under the eaves just out of reach of the rain, watching steadily for the light to give again.

Just strangely enough, it did not do this, although it was undoubtedly coming closer.

"What can it be?" thought Ralph. He was a boy much given to reading and fond of mysteries. His only copy then, was set aside to the wild old fashion when presently he made out the light to be that of a lantern held in the hand of a travesman about a hundred.

There were three other men on the car, which was coming by swiftly on the down grade toward the junction. One of them wore a silk hat and held an umbrella, and all four were gazing intently ahead of them into the darkness.

What were they after? How far were they going? Who was the man in the tail hat?

All these questions and more Ralph asked himself as the lantern flashed past him and was swallowed up in the gloom beyond.

He did not feel out until some two hours later, when he was aboard the slower of the isolated train. Then to his eager questioning the porter replied that the man in the silk hat was a celebrated detective in search of a bank robber. The train was so late that he had hired the landowner to take him over the down grade to the junction in time to catch the express train.

Ralph was greatly excited by this intelligence.

"It must be great fun to be a detective," he said to himself.

He little realized then that he was already connected on a track which would involve him in detective work hardly which that done by the fellow on the landowner—who did not capture his man after all—was but child's play.

And the odds of circumstances which were to lead to this began to make themselves manifest the next afternoon.

Only three passengers were in the rear car, and so was natural, two of them were seen in animated conversation. They were both young men. In fact, one was hardly more than sixteen years old, but there was something sturdy and independent about him, as if he felt that the whole world lay before him, and he had not the least doubt of his ability to gather it in.

"You, Mr. Jones," he was saying to his new acquaintance, as he glanced at the list of passengers in his hand, bearing the name inscription "Addition Jones, A. B." "Yes, I did rather wish to go to college myself, but you see, I couldn't make time."

Perhaps he expected Mr. Jones to be impressed with a sufficient sense of his importance; but that gentleman calmly went through his gold-rimmed eye glasses, with the air of a man far too deep in thought here to be concerned of the little trifles of those around him. Mr. Jones was an A. B. and a college tutor to boot, and being on his vacation, was in the case of a man out of his proper place in life, and totally innocent of all knowledge outside of his professional duties.

He thought Ralph Walpole, and therefore concluded to take the Jones into his confidence. By nature, he took Mr. Jones into his confidence without thinking about it at all.

"I never was so far from home as this before," said Ralph.

good hearted old maid who lived in the village, a regular dried specimen, who wanted him to do chores for her and be a sort of general boy of all work around her place, for which she promised to give him board and lodging, and helpful instructions. You may guess I didn't accept that offer, and before Colonel Clifford's letter came, including money for present expenses, I was pretty low down."

Mr. Jones listened with an much interest as was consistent with his lamplight state of mind, and with a few carefully put questions, soon brought

ALL FOUR WERE FIXING INTENTLY AHEAD INTO THE DARKNESS.

"Going to see friends?" asked Mr. Jones.

"Yes. That is, I'm going to see a gentleman whom I never saw before, but who was a friend of my father's."

"Father said you?" queried Addition.

"No, my father is dead. But I'll tell you how it was. He was an old friend of father's, and a very rich. He has no relatives except a nephew who is a bad lot, and so he wrote to me to come and stay with him, and give me to understand that he would make me his heir if he liked me."

His letter came mighty handy, too, I can tell you, for about mother died six months ago, I have been pretty well on my feet. I couldn't get anything to do except an offer from a man the subject of Ralph's letter. In fact, Ralph was learning to tell his story to some one; and he was not a little cheered by the efforts of the letters A. B. on Mr. Jones' part. And Mr. Jones, too, in spite of his inward misgivings, appeared to have a fair share of the love of adventure and romance, and lent such a willing hand to Ralph's efforts at story telling, that it was with regret on both sides that they parted as they reached the next station.

Ralph leaned out of his window in the hope of writing a farewell to his new friend, but was disappointed. He did not see him, which was not at all remarkable, as Mr. Addition Jones, A. B. had merely walked through to the forward car, and got in to make

BY JAMES F. BURNETT.

"There, I wish you'd just look over that lot, Carl, and make yourself familiar with it," said Mr. Jameson, passing a small book to his son, and pointing to the opposite side of the city office. "That's all and business—business I don't let, or at least, that name and name let, for three months and more," he continued, "and I want you to look them up and find out what the matter is with them. Let me tell you that this real estate business is not all it's cracked up to be."

"You don't want all those, do you, father?" asked Carl, looking at the book, which was a small volume of real estate, opening the book and glancing over the error of errors and mistakes.

"Oh, no, but I want some. It is the business of this agency to let houses, however, and it's a fact that if we don't find houses within three months, our clients begin to take their business elsewhere. Why, there's one house on that lot that hasn't been rented in nearly a month in seven years! But I can't let that one myself."

"Seven years?" exclaimed Carl, "what's the matter with it? Which one is it?"

"There it is, at the top of that page," said Mr. Jameson, pointing to the lot, and then, "There, seven years."

"Why, how is that? It reads well," declared the son, "it looks like a fine residence." He turned over a page of real estate, and found it was a small lot, and a small house. "What's the matter with it?"

"That's what I don't know," declared the son, "I bought that piece of old John Jones' property seven years ago. The house was occupied by them, and they had lived in it for a long time. I made some repairs and sold the lot to a man who lived in the neighborhood, and the house was moved out. I had several tenants within the next year, and they all left just about the same as they go in."

"But, what was the trouble?" asked Carl, "they all declared that there was something wrong about the place—that they heard strange noises and such stuff."

"A haunted house?" cried the father, "what's that?"

"That's what they call it," growled Mr. Jameson, "Facts—facts, every one of them."

"And you don't mean to say that such stories as that have kept the place unrented all these years?"

"Oh, I do," declared the father, "I'll tell you for a sure thing if I could. The place is being run up by its name. It's an old house and has been rented as long as that it won't let any more. I got so tired of being a fool for every new tenant and then having them go out like a ghost, that I've done nothing to it for the last three years. In fact, I haven't even let it once within that time."

"It must be in pretty bad shape," said Carl, "I'll look it over, without any one to take care of it."

"Oh, well, the last time I was out there it was not very bad. The front yard is overgrown with weeds and bushes, and the house needs painting and mending. But the front door and garden in the rear are good for the man next door, who looks out for the place in a profitable way, for the use of the lot."

and what he can make of the lot. "I'd like to see the place, father," said the son, "I'd like to see the place of seeing a real haunted house."

"The lot? You can have it for seven hundred dollars—the lot's worth that," exclaimed Mr. Jameson, "I don't know. These houses look and feel like that, but I don't know but they're right. At least, I've never had the time to try it."

"You tempt me to put a portion of my little patrimony into this venture," said Carl, "but I don't know if it is really haunted or not. I'll look it over in the next day or two. What a place for a house!"

"You'll never take a look at it first and talk with the neighbors. Don't you say it," he said.

"Oh, I declare, father, I believe I will look at it. I'll get Mr. Jones, and we'll run out and see it."

alone of the household in Massachusetts, but Carl had remained with his academic career was disappointed with his particular friend, Alfred Williams, had come to the city to "have out his place" in the business world.

Carl had obtained a position in a lawyer's office this father was well to the office for him, and together they took the morning for business. "The would naturally look for haunted houses in a certain connection with the city by looking for some one," Carl remarked as they went along their way at the morning rate of three or four miles an hour. "Mother, or father would make the ghost story."

They found a small, old, and well-shaded highway just the place for a country home. The house was respectable, and far apart from any general grounds about them. The house which had such an unpleasant reputation, was all that Mr. Jameson had said. It was a small, old-fashioned, two-story, of a style greatly admired forty or fifty years ago, and its appearance was quite in keeping with its history.

The front yard—large, wide, and well-kept—was overgrown with weeds. One of the two of the house was more and probably, the other was where the wind blew and howled and there a pair of stone was broken, where the stone here had "taken shape" at some time with people from the middle of the road.

The house, not more distant from the street, so that all its windows were not visible through the branches of the trees that stood in a narrow rank along the road. About every other pocket of the trees was a small, and all the others were broken. Carl pushed open the morning gate and they stepped inside and approached the door.

Not without some difficulty were they able to make an entrance, and then it was by the side door. The interior of the house was in rather better condition than the exterior, although the plastering had fallen away in places where the rain had leaked in and weakened it. Otherwise it would have been a small one, so Carl decided to let the place.

A few going out to view the rear premises they noted a dark, dark, long looking building, with a face like a skeleton, for shadows, hanging over the house which appeared the desired grounds from the first place on the way. The main door was decorated with straw and red whiskers, he held a pipe in his mouth, and was dressed in a comfortable of faded blue jeans, faded red shirt, and faded green trousers.

The house, by the way, had every appearance of having been renovated for business, for only the paint and wiring pipes were left. "Shades of Mom and Aaron!" cried the man, "it's an awfully good color."

"Did you notice those trousers, Carl? Brilliant green green, they were in their day, without a doubt."

These the supposed owner of clothing were not faded they certainly showed an unbecomingly bright shade of green. "I shall drop at those pants," Mr. Jameson declared and just then the individual who seemed to be the man who had promised to rent them, as he had them addressed the two young men.

"Here," he declared, "What I now will tell you."

And he now started Carl, proving himself a Yankee by converting the question by propounding another.

"Well, as father's business, as the city chap that has the better of the

to do and he could afford it while Carl went into the office of his father, who was also the guardian, inside the household where he had been born and spent all his previous life. Carl had a small sum of money deposited in the family bank, the remains of his father's modest fortune. This money he intended, after having the ghost house, to invest, with his guardian's consent, in some business, or in real estate.

Mr. Edward Jameson, as his friends said, played up being a real estate agent. He had no need of a larger income than he already possessed, but he was an active man and the business of buying, selling, and letting property on commission gave him something to do in every day time which otherwise might have dragged. He was a bachelor, lived in a small house "up town," and rather enjoyed the presence of his nephew in the office, and in his otherwise dull life.

His claim being relieved from his arduous duties of doing over potatoes, discovered books at the early hour of two, Carl went down

"No, you don't often see a handsome piece of workmanship than that rifle," remarked Captain Bryant, as I took the weapon from its place on the wall of his "den" and examined it with interest.

It was not one of the newest patterns, nor one which had ever been, to my knowledge, used in the army. The silver mounting and "ginger-bread" work on the stock plainly showed that. It was probably a sportsman's rifle, and knowing that the captain owed too little about the chase to purchase such a weapon, I turned to him for an explanation, well knowing that there must be some story connected with his possession of the piece.

"You're right—I never paid a cent for that piece," he said, sitting back in his worn-out chair. "That came into my possession along with other spoils of war—the year of Carter's terrible defeat near the Little Big Horn river."

"I didn't know that you were with Carter," I said, putting back the rifle and sitting down to listen to the tale.

"I wasn't; but in that same year—1876—General Miles made a raid into Montana Territory after the Banerocks and Nez Perce Indians, and I was with him, that rifle being a memento of the campaign."

"If you have read up on that, lieutenant, you will know that the Indians gathered in great force among the Big Horn Mountains, in and near Black Canyon, and General Miles was able to follow the trail of a band of them right to headquarters. A wilder country you couldn't find at that day than the neighborhood of the Big Horn, and game was plentiful as grasshoppers in a hay-mow."

"We had several old fishermen with us for scouts and hunters, among them a man who had spent almost his entire life in the wilderness, Joe McNulty by name. At that time Indian scouts were not common among the troops, for there were few relatives of friendly tribes or otherwise, whom we could trust."

"I hadn't got my commission then—yet it was the first year—and was only a little party of soldiers, as they would have been called in war times—several scouts, and a few men from the tribe who were known to be dead shots."

"When the main body of the army reached the Big Horn, look! An Indian hadn't been seen for days and the general, believing some devilry on foot, threw out my little party, and several smaller ones, as 'lookers.'"

"I was ordered to skirt the base of the range to the westward, and return to the main body of the troops at night. Joe McNulty was with me, and about a dozen other men, including a young fellow named Appleton—little Appleton as the men called him. He was small of figure, their animals were no fresher than ours. The trail led us right into hills, and after crossing a low ridge and passing through a deep cut place place for an ambush, Joe said afterwards we struck a good size valley, partly grassgrown, but with a few scrub oaks and thousands of clumps of sage brush upon it."

"Way across the plain we saw the Indians we were chasing, and the boys let out a yell and we got after them. We'd made about twenty rods when we rolled completely over the poor fellows, crushing the life out of him in an instant."

"The next moment we were behind the low hills and a few shots from our shelter sent the rebels back to a safer position. The cut in the hillside was a regular trap, and our horses were as well sheltered as ourselves. While it continued daylight the enemy could not get above us and thus fire into our flanks and rear."

"The Indians retired out of rifle range and spread out in a half circle on the plain, picking their horses in groups, and occasionally in a hurry to renew the attack. Evidently they were going to wait either for night before attacking the again, or else intended starting us out. Joe McNulty and I climbed to the summit of a low hill to view the situation."

"Then's Banerocks—a Nez Perce among 'em, said the old scout, after a slight at the weapon."

"Banerocks, eh?" repeated little Appleton, who was a Nez Perce, and had climbed up in our rear. "I've got Banerocks at home, but don't see if I want to eat those fellows."

"Yes, they're Banerocks," Joe repeated without mistaking Appleton's banter. "And that's their chief, I reckon—the tall fellow with the monstrous lot o' feathers in his hair. Ain't he a beauty?"

"The Indian looked to was a savage of immense size, who stood up and down on their 'color line' with all the dignity of a commander-in-chief."

"Jimmy, wouldn't I like to pick him off, though," exclaimed little Appleton."

"If you've got a weapon that'll shoot half a mile, I reckon you'll do it, sonny," repeated Joe."

"Appleton nodded at this and crawled down the rock."

"We're in for it this time, I reckon, sonny," went on Joe. "That chap, if he kin only keep his horses in line, will just stay there until he starves us out. But yo kin don't lose neither man, provided the young brats don't kick over the traces."

"You think we're doin'ers, then, Joe?" said I.

"Haven't a doubt of it. I bet yo General Miles has got his own hands full by this time, or about these days will fix us up so we can't defend ourselves. Lem's one day's rations."

"Joe usually took the gloomiest view possible of life, and was forever looking on the dark side of things."

"Oh, we ain't in any danger of starving," I returned. "There's the horses yet. They'll keep us a month."

"Banerocks" is the Nez Perce name for Banerocks.

suddenly discovered that the wily redskins had led us into the worst kind of trap. The party we were chasing wheeled and from out a little notch on our left came a big, big band—full half a hundred—howling like demons."

"Back to the rocks," yelled Joe, and we whirled around and made for the pass again."

"But the odds cut in ahead of us, and we had to scurry to the eastward towards a pile of boulders which partly sheltered a deep cut in the hillside. Both hands opened fire at the same time and two of our men dropped from their horses. We replied with about the same effect, but they came on like the wind, our volleys deterring them not an iota."

"We had almost reached the shelter when they fired again and shot one of our horses. His rider was not able to get his feet out of the stirrups quickly enough, and when the brute fell he

CHAPTER I. THE YOUNG HUNTER.

The report of a gun rang through the woods, a thin column of smoke curled slowly above the bushes, and a moment later a boy came out of the thicket.

"That was a good shot," he muttered, looking toward an adjacent tree. "I didn't think I could get him."

He was now under the tree, searching for something which he evidently expected to find. He was not disappointed. In a few moments he reached down, and when he straightened up he held in his hand a live gray squirrel.

He examined the mouse for a while, as all sportsmen do, then dropping it into the bag suspended at his side, turned his attention to reloading the gun.

"It's a fine morning for squirrels," he told himself, as he peered the powder into the barrel. "I ought to get several before going home."

At the same moment his attention was attracted by a fainter noise in a neighboring oak, and he concluded that another squirrel was near.

As quickly as possible he finished reloading, then began working his way toward the tree from which the hint of noise came falling.

"That's a squirrel sure," he muttered. "I want one that he doesn't escape."

He continued carefully through the thicket until he secured a position directly under the tree. He looked up among the branches, but the leaves were so dense that he was unable to locate the mouse.

He began walking slowly round the oak, straining his eyes to catch a glimpse of the squirrel, but fully five minutes passed, and he was not successful. The mouse of course continued to drop, however, and he knew the game was there, deriving considerable money to demonstrate the fact.

"I'll catch sight of you after a while," said the youth, "and when I do, look out for yourself!"

Just then he stopped upon something which broke under his foot with a sharp noise, and the next instant a commotion was heard in the tree top above. The squirrel, alarmed at the noise, had started from his perch, and was making his way through the branches at a rapid rate.

The gun of the young hunter was quickly put to his shoulder, and the squirrel vanished in an instant. This time, too, he was successful, and the second squirrel found its way to his game bag.

"Two done well so far," he said with satisfied satisfaction. "Wonder how George is making out? He's very well, I guess. I haven't heard him shoot since yet."

But as he uttered these words a gun roared in the distance, and the boy ran toward it.

"That's his gun," he said, "but he's missed the first time and fired again."

The last remark was considered by a second remark following the first in quick succession, and in a moment or so the third shot rang out.

"Well there," said the youthful sportsman disapprovingly, "he's missed twice, and had to fire the third shot. Wonder if he was successful that time?"

Then, notwithstanding he continued his way through the woods, he still watched for more game, and was rewarded at last by catching a glimpse of another squirrel running along the limb of a dead tree some distance off. He did not like to risk a shot from where he stood, so began working his way quickly toward the tree, but the squirrel had already disappeared.

He was now under the tree, searching for something which he evidently expected to find. He was not disappointed. In a few moments he reached down, and when he straightened up he held in his hand a live gray squirrel.

"THAT WILL SHOW MEY YOUR CLOTHES," SAID THE BOY, HOLDING HIS HAND OUT OVER THE TREE.

The young hunter was sure he could be seen again somewhere in the vicinity, and did not delay in getting over the intervening distance. This he was able to do in a short time, as the woods in this part were comparatively free from underbrush, and he was not hampered by having to force his way through it.

He reached the tree, and stationed himself near by to watch the large hole he could see in the trunk a few inches above the thick, dense foliage he had first caught sight of the squirrel. He was under the impression that the game had gone into the hollow, and would soon reappear after recovering from the fright which had probably caused its retreat.

"I suppose he now or found me coming," said the young hunter, "and was startled."

He continued to watch the hole, and

Just then a slight noise attracted his attention, and looking round he beheld a large squirrel crawling along the ground. Easing his rifle he aimed carefully, but before he could press the trigger the game vanished behind a stump. He kept his gun in position, thinking it would come into view on the opposite side, but as the seconds passed and it did not do so he began a methodical advance.

"Hearge, where he went," was his mental observation. "Perhaps he is hiding behind the stump, and will show himself when I come up."

He held his gun ready for use, but there was no necessity for this precaution as he discovered when he got near enough to see on the other side of the obstruction. "Well, that beats me," he cried in surprise. "If that squirrel isn't somewhere around this stump I must be blind. He I know I saw him go there, and I didn't see him leave."

He soon reached the object in question, and a careful examination of the side around which the squirrel had gone revealed a small aperture at the base into which he must have entered.

"Ah!" said the boy, "that explains it." Now came the question how to enter the game. He looked the hole with great interest, then, thoroughly inspected the entire parts of the stump to see that there were no other means of access from it.

The aperture at the base was the only one he could find, and there was no danger of the game escaping while he was not looking. But there was little satisfaction in this reflection, for the more difficult part of the business was yet to be accomplished—that of getting possession of his prisoner.

"I don't know how I can do it," he said, looking at the stump in perplexity. "If only George was here to help me."

Just then a shot was heard very far, and the youth started in a cry of delight. He knew his brother would hurry to his assistance, and had no time in calling to him.

"George!" he shouted. "I say, George!" "Hello!" came the answer, and a few minutes later the figure of a boy a little older and larger than the young hunter appeared on the scene.

A live brown leader was along through

The Great Herneville Robbery

BY JAMES T. FILLER.

There are two killings which, above all others, are deemed worthy and notorious by those not familiar with them, and few criminals there are who know better than those who have followed one or the other. These killings whose striking interest is so overrated are those of the sailor and the special police officer, whose time and talents (what few he may have) are devoted to the detection of criminals.

Poor Jack finds very little of the excitement of Captain Herneville's case, more to his hard conscience, and the "Old Blunder" and "Simon Sharpe" of the Half-Dime Detective seem to have absorbed nearly all the attention of those known to detective circles.

Occasionally, of course, a man will be assigned to a case which has about it more interest of the mysterious and thrilling, but although I was on the detective staff of a large city for nearly forty years, I can count on my two fingers the cases which contained any adventure or very much excitement.

The usual man and substance of a case was a continued examination of people's lives for years back, and the keeping of a watchful eye over their present movements. There, more than anything else, with the detective his case, and often when it is direct opposition to his "theory." Why, I have even been engaged on a case by the very person who committed the crime!

That reminds me of an incident that occurred all of twenty years ago, and which, at the time, the papers called "The Great Herneville Robbery." Captain Herneville was my superior then, and he assigned the case to me. That you may better understand the case let me sketch a short history of the people prominently connected with the robbery.

Julian Herneville was one of the best known men in the city, and besides a large fortune left him by his father, had accumulated a good bit of property in his long business career. He had married rather late in life, and his wife had soon died, leaving him one child—a girl. This child—Mabel Herneville—was not quite seventeen when her father died, and at the time was attending a fashionable boarding school up town as a "day pupil." Her father's establishment was at once broken up, and she went to the school as a boarder. This was in accordance with the wishes of her father's executor, and her uncle and guardian, Miss Herneville.

This Miss Herneville, her father's only heiress, was made sole executrix by the will, and at once entered into the administration of her father's property, for, excepting several little legacies to the servants and a very handsome sum given to his brother, Julian Herneville had left his entire fortune to his daughter. Having closed the great up town house, which was part of her father's share, her uncle placed a waitress in charge to care for the family plate and jewels and commenced to "straighten out" the property, as he called it, although, as his brother Julian had been a most methodical and clear headed business man, there was doubt in some quarters as to what this "straightening out" might mean. But this I learned afterward.

The matter first came to my attention through the ordinary police channels. A woman named McCarrie, whose husband was a night watchman and other valuables which had not been taken to the bank were kept had been broken into and the burglar had made a clean sweep. In the basement the policeman found the watchman with a broken skull and so injured that he could not speak. Of course he was hurried off to the hospital and the case reported to the chief.

With this information you may be sure that I promised to do my best and secured him of the fact. While I was jotting down some notes of the incident in my book, Mr. Herneville summoned a clerk.

"Mr. Smith," he said, passing the young man a note and a bunch of keys, "you will please get an expressman and go to my late brother's resi-man, reported that "her man" had not returned home for two days and she was frightened over his absence as he was a most respectable, steady-going man. He was watching at a house up the avenue, and inquiry brought out the fact that it was the Julian Herneville house. She had been to the house, but could not get an answer to her summons for admission, and was afraid that something had happened.

Mr. Herneville was communicated with at once and went with the officers to his late brother's residence. True enough, something had happened, and something very serious, too. The brick house in which the

Mr. Herneville had an interview with Captain Herneville at once and at the same time the captain sent me to the administrator's office.

"Mr. Filler," said that gentleman, after telling me everything he knew about the case, "I want you to spare no effort in discovering the perpetrators of this deed, but I must request you to work quickly. I have made arrangements to go to Europe—business arrangements which cannot be broken, and you—come with them. I'll send you a present of one thousand dollars."

Since and send the two trunks, which are in my old room on the second floor." Mr. Herneville had lived at his brother's house before Julian's demise "down to my indignity. I was up there last week and picked up some clothing which I thought I might need on my journey; but I believe that I did not lock the trunks. There are the keys, Mr. Smith, and you will please see that the trunks are fastened before you let the expressman have them."

"One moment, please," he added, as the clerk was about to turn away: "would you not like to see the house,

Captured by Smugglers.

BY NED HASTINGS.

In the last room of the setting was a faded old man, Fred Carson, shaded his eyes with his hand and looked ruefully round.

"Any signs of a ship yet, father?" asked a son, Will, who was seated in the stern of the boat, managing the tiller.

"No," answered the man, in a tone of sad disappointment. "I'm afraid we'll be obliged to spend another night on this sea. I expected surely to run across some land by this time, but it appears we're at the mercy of all ships."

"Well, never mind. We may see one to-morrow," said the boy hopefully.

But the man was not so sanguine. He goes to the stern of the boat, where some of the crew were passing round, and more than that he at first appeared, and then he passed a troubled expression to appear on his face.

He tried to look cheerful, however, as he turned his head, and looked himself going out some provisions on which to the table waiting meal. His son was now of talking to with a ship before long as he had not the heart to discourage him with an adverse opinion.

This was their second day on the ocean, it seems that thirty six hours they had shut away, constantly on the lookout for land, but none appeared and hence he is to depart from Fred Carson's throat as a hopeless prospect before them was as fully realized.

"I'm afraid we made a mistake in not doing with the others, my boy," he said helplessly, as he looked his son a nervous smile of the provision he had seen from the bottom.

"I don't think so. There are probably still about in the same manner in our view, and may even be in a worse way, or even be wrong and large, we have only to stand off and on, and if necessary, sail back and this way for more than a week," answered the youth, as he looked at his father and began to dispose of his share of the food.

"I know all that, but at the same time would feel better satisfied if I could get my money in a safe place. It gives me a real deal of uneasiness to have such a large sum of money about me, and that is the only reason why I persuaded upon Captain Blanning to let us have this boat of deposit by ourselves."

As he spoke he produced a large wallet on the handle pocket of his coat, and reached to inspect the contents. It was filled almost to bursting, and as Will glanced at it he could not suppress a sense of astonishment as he reflected what his loss might mean to his father.

"How much did you say was there?" asked Mr. Carson, having turned himself that the amount was intact, returned it to his pocket.

"Between thousand dollars. I'd be sorry to say it, but it's a very small sum to me, and I'm nobody know about it when we are locked up. That is if we have that good chance," he added with a sigh.

"Oh, I think we will," the boy replied. "Don't let the money worry you, father. Once we'll know we've got it, and once we get on another ship we'll soon be safe."

"I hope so. We would have been all right now if I had not been for the long waiting time in that most uncertain. I had known it was going to come, and I have seen the risk and gone with the tide."

"After all I think we were too hasty in using the ship, anyhow. We would have been held together for hours yet, and during that time some other craft would have come to our assistance. Captain Blanning and his crew are about to risk remaining on her for a while longer, and we should have stayed with him."

"But the other passengers were sure she could not hold together an hour longer," said Will. "Surely they must have known something about it."

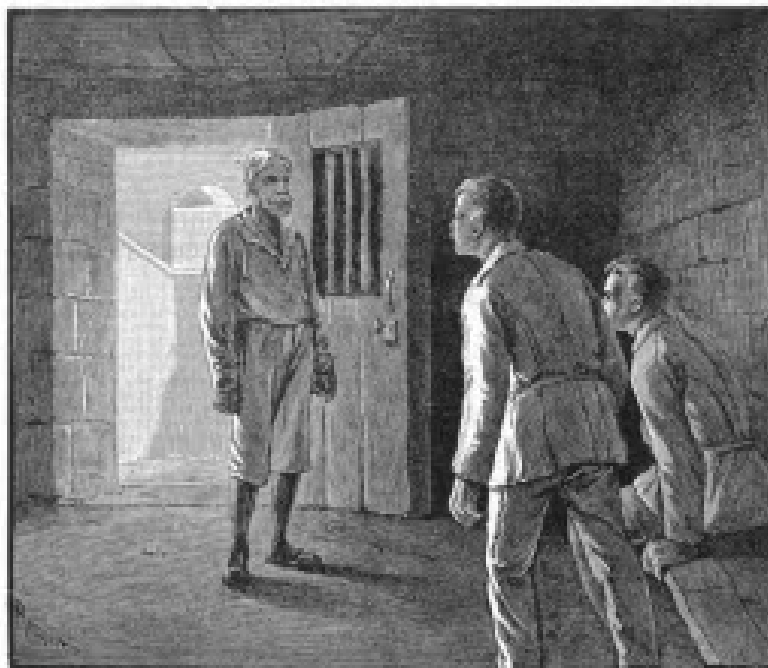

"They were too frightened to know

Mr. Carson, being about to trust himself among strangers, with so much money, had requested the captain to be himself and have one of the small boats, and soon after the two set out alone for the point that looked up to the distance. They had not gone far on their way, however, when a dense fog settled over the sea, and when it finally lifted they found themselves out of sight of

"What now?"

"Those men appear to be watching us closely. I am afraid they want to rob us."

Will glanced up thoroughly frightened. The men did seem to be watching the boat and his very next thought was, "What now?" and Will felt a sense of uneasiness about the men as he realized it. Three of the men were standing near what they were talking about," said Mr. Carson. "and we were foolish to listen to them."

"Well, we'll have to make the best of it now," said Will, philosophically, as, having finished eating, he turned his attention to the tiller again.

Mr. Carson settled back in his seat, and watched himself in the situation with as good grace possible. There were in no immediate danger of disaster; their boat was strong and sturdy, and the weather was clear and gave fair indications of continuing so, and had it not been for the large sum on his person, the shipwrecked man would not have been so anxious about the future.

He had been sent to a foreign city by the firm for which he worked to collect this money, and had taken his son with him. On the return voyage the ship had been wrecked within a few miles of the coast, and though the captain declared there was no danger of going to pieces, the passengers insisted on leaving, and were allowed to take to one of the boats and depart.

last, and all efforts to get their bearings were fruitless.

Since then they had drifted about expecting to come in sight of some coast, but the hours were on and no vessel came to their aid. How far from land they were now it was impossible to tell, and so might easily be a great deal from even the hope that Will could not entirely help feeling uncertain.

The next morning, however, a sail was sighted not far away. Their signal of distress was soon discovered, and a short time afterwards they found themselves on board a small schooner with a number of rough-looking men crowding around them, asking all sorts of questions.

Mr. Carson was alarmed. He did not like the appearance of the sailors, and from the keen manner in which he and his son were watched during the day, he was well pleased the vessel, he concluded that he had good cause to be fearful.

"I'm afraid we're none of us more than what we were in the small boat," he said to Will, as they stood together in the stern of the schooner.

by, but when they saw that their presence was demanded upon they departed, and sought another quarter of the schooner.

Meanwhile the vessel stood on her way. There was no indication of land to be seen. This made Mr. Carson all the more uncomfortable. The conviction that they had been picked up by a gang of thieves, smugglers, or worse still, pirates, was strong upon him, and he tried to prepare himself for future trouble.

"How I wish I had some kind of a weapon with me," he told himself again and again. "I am utterly at their mercy, and they could rob me any time they chose."

But though he was momentarily looking for an outbreak of some sort, none came, and during the middle of the afternoon, as no land had yet appeared, he ventured to ask one of the men where they were bound.

The fellow laughed and replied sarcastically: "Oh, you'll know that in a few hours. Don't get restless."

But Carson began now to grow very uneasy. He was sure the crew were Rupert's Ambition.

BY HENRY HARRIS, JR.

Author of "Clever Sam," "Lester's Luck," "Ragged Dick Jones," etc.

CHAPTER I. RUPERT LEAVES HIS PLACE.

"Rupert, the superintendent wishes to see you."

Rupert Rutledge, a tall boy of sixteen, was engaged in folding some pieces of cloth which had been always during the day to customers. It was the principal salaried man of Tenney & Rhodes, who conducted a large wholesale dry goods house in the lower part of New York City.

"Very well, Harry," he said. "I will go at once. I wonder what he wants to see me about."

"I don't know. I hope it is to raise your wages."

"That isn't likely in these dull times, though a raise would be very welcome."

When Rupert had finished folding the pieces he was upon to left his place and knocked at the door of a small room occupied by the superintendent.

A man of about forty was seated at a desk, writing.

"Mr. Frost," said Rupert respectfully. "I have you wish to speak with me."

"Yes, take a seat."

Rupert was glad for he had been on his feet all day, and was glad to sink into a chair near the door.

"How long have you been in my employ?" asked the superintendent in the quick tones habitual to him.

"Nearly six months."

"So I supposed. You are one of the best clerks I have seen."

"Yes, sir."

"I am sorry I have had none for you. Mr. Tenney feels in view of the dullness in business that it will be advisable to diminish his clerical force. As you are one of the best taken on, he has selected you and a few others for discharge."

Rupert turned pale. What a terrible misfortune this would be to him to well know. The future seemed to him dark indeed.

"I hope, sir," he said in an steady voice, "that the firm is not dissatisfied with me."

"Oh no. No indeed! I have heard only good reports of you. We shall be glad to recommend you to any other firm."

"Thank you, sir. When do you wish me to go?"

"You can stay till the end of the week."

Rupert bowed and left the room. He had been in a while, and he felt that a calamity had indeed fallen upon him. His wages were but five dollars a week, but this sum, small as it was, was the main support of his mother and sister, the latter a chronic invalid only two years younger than himself. What they were to do when this small income was taken away he could not conjecture. He felt that he must look out at once for a new place.

"Well, Rupert, what business did the superintendent have with you?" asked Harry Harlow, Rupert's most intimate friend in the store.

Harry Harlow is still elsewhere as well as with us. It isn't a good time to change places."

"Well, you'll get something else. All branches of business may not be so dull as ours."

Harry Harlow had a singular disposition, and always looked on the bright side. His associates nicknamed Rupert a little, and he determined to do his best to find something to do, no matter what.

poor mother from her position of dependence.

"What is the matter, mother?" he asked. "Are you not well?"

"Yes, Rupert," she answered raising her head, "but for the moment I feel discouraged. There has been nothing more than good today. Business and poverty, too, are hard to bear."

"That is true, mother," and Rupert's heart sank as he remembered that by the end of the week the poverty would become destitution.

"There has been nothing to eat anything today. She thought she could eat an orange, but I absolutely didn't have money enough to buy one."

"She shall have an orange," said Rupert in a low voice.

The sick girl heard and her face brightened. It was an instinctive cry, such as a sick person sometimes has.

"I should enjoy an orange," she said softly. "I think I could sleep after eating one."

"I will get right out and get one."

Rupert ran on his hat and went down stairs.

"You may have a loaf of bread, Rupert," said his mother as he was starting. "That is, if you have money enough."

"Yes, mother."

There was an Italian fruit vendor's stall at the next corner. As he stepped out on the sidewalk Rupert took on his slender person and examined its contents. It held but thirty-five cents and this meant last night Saturday night when he would receive his weekly wages.

Going to the stand, he examined the Italian's stock. He saw some large, attractive oranges marked "five cents." There were some smaller ones marked three cents, but Rupert judged that that was over and would not please his sister. But five cents was readily able for him to pay under the circumstances. It represented one seventh of his scanty stock of money.

"Won't you let me have one of these oranges for five cents?" he asked.

Merito, the Italian, shook his head.

"No," he answered. "It is good oranges. It is worth more than I ask."

Rupert sighed and hesitated.

"I suppose I shall have to pay it," he said regretfully.

He drew out his purse, and took out a nickel.

"I'll take an orange," he said.

"Is it for yourself?" asked a gentle voice.

Rupert turned and saw a tiny woman not over five feet in height with a pleasant, kindly face.

"No," he said, "it is for my sister."

"Is your sister sick?"

"Yes, she has taken a fancy to an orange, and I want her to have one, but—it is extravagant for me in my circumstances to pay a nickel for one."

RUPERT STEPPED FORWARD AND STROVE TO RAISE HIS MOTHER FROM HER POSITION OF DEPENDENCY.

"Only to tell me that I was discharged," said Rupert quietly.

"Why, that's a shame!" exclaimed Harry Harlow. "What are you discharged for?"

"Only on account of dull times. The house will give me a recommendation."

"It seems you had you are to go. Why didn't they discharge me, too?"

"You have been here longer, and it is only those last taken on who must go. I suppose it is all right, but it is hard."

"Keep up your courage, Rupert. It isn't as if you were discharged for cause. With a recommendation from Tenney & Rhodes you ought to find another place here."

"Yes in ordinary times, but you

As five o'clock the store closed. To-day stores kept open late, but early hours are one of the advantages of a wholesale establishment.

Rupert found his steps towards Elizabeth Street. In an upper apartment in one of the shabby houses fronting on this thoroughfare lived his mother and sister. It was only a three-story house, and there were but two flights of stairs to ascend.

Entering the principal room, Rupert saw his mother with her head bent in an attitude of dejection over the table. Through a door he could see his sister lying listlessly on a bed in a small inner room, her face showing that she was suffering pain.

Rupert stepped forward and with tender sympathy strove to raise his Frank Winter's Christmas Assignment.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JR.

"It's the most extraordinary happening. Just going to spend my whole Christmas." Frank Winter slammed his derby down on the table with an emphasis that did not require the addition of words to show that he was, in anything but a holiday frame of mind.

"Hello, Francis, what's the matter?" exclaimed his room mate, Joe Craig, turning away for an instant from the bureau mirror before which he was shaving. "I expected to have you come home tonight in an ordinary, only a little short of that you will be, in tomorrow when you start for Newville."

"Wonderful!" replied Frank. "That's the whole substance of it. I wish I'd never been invited there home."

"Great Scott!" cried Joe, almost setting himself in his soap. "I thought your heart was not on this visit above all other things."

"So it was, and that's what makes me feel all the worse because I can't go."

"Can't go? Why—how—what?"

"Oh, Mr. Kimberley, the editor. You know he gave me leave of absence from the editorial of the job in the morning of the 15th. Now he comes to me with an assignment for tomorrow night—Christmas Eve. Just think of it, when the Peckens are to have their last run."

"But didn't you remind him that you weren't to be here?"

"No, there wasn't any need to. He began by saying that he knew he had given me off, but that then he couldn't because that Professor Peckens would resign his chair at Harvard College to-morrow, according to his story, the president insisted him. They had tried to get an interview with him in Boston, but he couldn't be found. He was coming to New York, somebody said, would arrive tomorrow night to spend Christmas with his sister, a Mrs. Smith, in a flat up town. And because I know a little French Kimberley supplied me with the assignment."

"You may do as soon as you turn in your copy of the interview!" he said. But what good will that do me? The last look for Westville horses at four o'clock, I can't get out there till ten the next morning, and most of the fun is to be on Christmas Eve. I've had a mind to throw over the whole thing."

"What, give up your position on the 'Express' just because a little pleasure trip is interfered with?"

"There was a whole lot of horse in Joe Craig's tone."

"Well, that's what I feel like doing now," retorted Frank. "What will the Peckens think? I've accepted their invitation and I know they've counted on me for some of the game tomorrow night. I've said it's going to make it awkward for them as well as mighty disappointing for me. I don't know as I care about going at all if I can't get away tomorrow."

"But the Peckens will understand it when you explain that the exigencies of getting out a great metropolitan daily compel you to remain in town over-extended. Indeed, they will be impressed with your importance."

"Rock! That isn't going to make it any easier for me to make up Christmas morning in this dismal hole all alone. You'll be sure, starting tomorrow at home, and all that will be left for me to do will passy Christmas there wasn't much loneliness in his town. And in the afternoon, when he passed so many happy faced people on the streets with wreaths in their hands, his own lot seemed harder to bear than ever.

He had made a last desperate effort that morning to secure the evening for himself by borrowing (if there wasn't a possibility of finding the professor in before

"I guess I'll have to put one of those at random," he said to himself. "Get into the house that way, and then go from door to door till I find my man."

It is the ring-out of the bells, and when he to think over the good times I have missed."

"Not a bit of it. You'll have to hustle on, in such that early train to Westville, that you won't have any time to waste in search over the past. Come up, old fellow! Think how much worse things might have been. You might never have been invited to visit the Peckens at all."

This view of the case was instrumental in sending Frank's spirits up a few degrees, but it took him a long while to compose the letter to Daisy Peckens explaining why he would not be able to wish to the letter of his engagement for Christmas.

But the next morning when he bade Joe good-by after breakfast and wished him a night. But Mr. Kimberley's response was decidedly snappish.

"Don't tell me that he won't write me till this evening? Here is his sister's address. You had better call there about eight, and give us half a column."

Frank had never felt so homesick in his life as he did at his boarding house that night at eleven. Joe Craig had gone; he had most everybody else. There were no children in the house and no little Christmas Eve for the air of the place was particularly depressing.

Frank got out of his room as he could and started for Harlem to find the Mrs. Smith, whose address had been given to him. He arrived at the apartment house the number called for about eight o'clock the door swung open walked into the hall. Application on the left hand side on this floor resulted in the direction, "Up stairs."

Frank wanted to inquire how many flights, but the maid had evidently been bothered this way on many previous occasions, for she shut the door almost in his face.

"She must be in something of the same frame of mind as myself," mused Frank. "She ought to have waited till I could shake hands with her."

At his next stopping place, a sweet faced lady, with hair slightly gray, opened the door for him.

"Does Mrs. Smith live here?" Frank inquired.

BUCK KINGDON'S RIDE.

BY MARK HARRINGTON.

With a loud shriek of alarm the horse suddenly stopped.

"What is it, old fellow?" said Buck, looking carefully around.

He could see nothing suspicious, and tried to urge the animal forward. The horse refused to obey, and again Buck stopped around.

"I don't see anything, Bob," he said to the horse, "you've made a mistake this time."

At this juncture a slight commotion in the grass ahead caught Buck's attention, and a moment later the head of an Indian was cautiously raised in view. Only for an instant did the warrior look up, then dropped back into the grass.

Buck quickly lowered his rifle, and brought it around in front of him.

"Just show yourself again," he muttered, "and I'll give you a dose of lead."

He continued to watch the place where the Indian had disappeared, but could see nothing more of him. He was beginning to wonder why the rebelle did not look up again when once more the first sign of the grass attracted his attention. This time it was all of a dozen yards from the place where he had first seen the warrior.

Then Buck knew there were two Indians, and the one was carefully working his way through the grass to a place where he could take an observation without being seen. The youth soon found that the latter theory was the correct one. The grass continued to ripple over as slightly as the warrior dragged himself along, and Buck watched it with great attention. A grin came settled upon his face.

"I see what you're after, you red-skinned," he muttered. "You know I see you Indian, and you want to crawl around so you can shoot me unawares, well, I'll show you a trick worth two of that."

Presently the commotion in the grass ceased. The Indian had stopped, and Buck held himself in readiness to receive him when his head appeared above the grass.

The next moment the reptilian features of the savage were lifted in view only to drop back like a flash as he saw the young scout's rifle leveled at him. Just in time, too. The sharp crack of the weapon broke the stillness of the scene instant, and the savage found the tip of the bullet unaccountably close to his dark brow.

Quite as naturally the Indian rolled over, and again his agility proved himself. Another shot from the young scout's Winchester rang out, and the bullet tore up the earth where the Indian had been, only an instant before. Buck had fired now, but the rebelle's headlight had saved him.

The youth did not waste another shot. He knew the foe in the grass would ridicule him with lead the moment an opportunity offered, and he had no ammunition to throw away in chance shots. Besides he could not tell how many Indians were concealed near by.

He glanced quickly around again, and his mind here was recalled as he saw a band of mounted rebelle coming rapidly toward him over the plains. They were as yet all at two miles away, but the speed with which they were advancing would soon bring them near.

For a moment Buck hesitated all about the foe in the grass, and this came very near proving fatal. A loud report sounded, and the ball grazed past the youth's arm, carrying away part of his coat sleeve. With an angry shout he wheeled around, and fired once at the spot over which the smoke from the Indian's weapon was curling. But the cunning savage had not taken care of himself and no harm came to him.

The animal bounded away, and at the same moment the savage in the rear sprang to his feet, aiming his gun at the retreating scout. Buck was on the look-out, however, and fell forward on his horse just as the shot was delivered.

Thus like a flash he leveled his own gun, and the Indian dropped as the shot home, and the noble horse responded with a fresh burst of speed.

"Go it, old fellow," urged the youth, "I don't want to do any more shooting if I can help it. That round buck there tried hard enough to kill me, and if he was left it would kill me, right through I am sorry I had to do it."

BUCK WAVING HIS HAT IN THE AIR, AND HURTLING IN TRIUMPH.

"We must get out of this, Bob," cried Buck. "I don't like to run away, old fellow, but I'd be better to stay here now longer."

He threw another hasty glance over his shoulder, and was alarmed to see that the advancing savages were not more than a mile distant. They were shooting like fiends, and Buck knew it was time to fly.

"Come, Bob," he cried, "show 'em what you can do."

He turned the horse as he spoke, still keeping an eye on the savages in the grass.

was heard, but whether hit or not, Buck could not say. He would have returned and made sure of it had he deemed it profitable to do so, but the incoming savages rendered the act out of the question.

And now the latter were near enough to admit of no further delay. He must put his horse to his best speed and be off at once. It was only because of the great confidence he had in his horse that he overpowered that he had delayed so long in leaving.

With a last look at the place where the Indian had dropped, Buck spoke to his

Then mounting he dashed on. He was so sure that his horse could outdistance the savages that he did not look back as often as he otherwise would have done, and he was suddenly brought to an uncomfortable realization of his mistake when he saw a rifle shot speeding in the rear, and a moment later dropping in the grass beside him.

He wheeled around just as another shot was fired, and this time the Indian savages passed over his head with an angry cry. There were no less than a dozen Indians in all, several of whom were so well

CHAPTER I.

TOM LATTIMER TO THE RESCUE.

"It seems too good to be true, doesn't it, Tom? Just now how fulfilled the prophecy is, and to think that we are to live here all the time!"

John Lattimer and his brother were out for a tramp, a "pleasure jaunt," Tom called it, for he had taken a branch in the school house-work and they presumed to go so far in their exploring time that they would not get back till night-fall.

"Yes, and still he just as nice in return," added Tom. "The country for me every time."

"And the, too," said John. "What happier days we will have here, and how grateful we ought to be!"

Several summers and winters had passed since their leaving school, and truly the Lattimers were not inexperienced men in the ways of the country, but nevertheless it was here that they were to have the darkest hour in their experience, and the shadow of their lives is to fall on this winter afternoon, when the brother and sister, now seventeen and fifteen respectively, were taking a spin on their wheels over the happy places of road where John had received his first education of thanksgiving.

"Now, John, let's have a good run down this hill. It's a wonder to me, no wonder, I suppose, of me, no wonder we can still down to school."

"Oh, let's try a new one, Tom. I'm sure I can keep up with you; perhaps beat you, for all I know."

"All right, Miss Presumption, try it; I'm willing. Our two wheels—and off!"

The two young people dashed away, side by side, looking in their clashing dark blue bicycle wheels, and perched on their flash- ing wheels, like two glancing dragons, their whirling wheels going down the wide brown country road between the hills and trees.

By Lattimer, their father, held a good position as head messenger to the man after a ring from of October 4th, New York. He had built a comfortable house for his family in the quiet New Jersey hamlet, Lattimer, which had an hour's ride of the city, and went to his business in the morning, and came home at night every day of the week.

This young John, an already knut, heavily engaged their rural existence. They were fond of such of their companionship as had been and often ought to be, but are not in reality. And any of them after school hours they might be seen taking a spin together on some expedition, or from an arched, or from a shelter and laughing with the ever fresh note of a thoughtfully composed pair.

In this country, weather and roads being favorable, they had been for weeks, making a number of their evening friends to join them that even in the shade on the street of winter afternoons should have returned into night.

Down the long slope the merry pale steamed, the keen air splashing their cheeks and making their eyes sparkle bristling as it rushed past them, sometimes Tom drove ahead, but when he heard the purring breath of his glider coming up, his brother's heart always smote him and he slowed down again till the wind cut reproachfully.

"There, Tom, I confess it. You're cheating."

And across stretched their ears, and in their breast their eyes in the direction of the sound a starting light burst upon them.

The road they were traversing was crossed by the railroad track at the foot of the slope, another road ran into it a short distance ahead of them—about half way between them and the track; and on this road they saw through the haze from a carriage being furiously dragged along by a runaway horse, while the colored giving his sister a moment's pause Tom mounted and was off like the wind. For the moment he had not been able to turn the runaway as he had instead of down, and apparently giving way to sudden panic at sight of the coming train, he had flung himself out of the carriage on to the road, letting his mistress go on alone to a fate which was terrible unless either the horse or the train could be stopped before reaching the crossing.

John came down on her knees in the

"IT SEEMS ALMOST TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE, DOESN'T IT, TOM?"

"Oh? Cheating?" cried Tom heartily. "How do you make that out?"

"You're just darning along—as if I was a baby that would say if I was beaten!" said John, pointing. "Now I won't have you stand before me if I am a girl. Be your best, sir, and let me take my right of myself."

"I know you've got speech enough for anything," rejoined Tom. "But I don't see you collapse three miles from home. You can hardly speak now for getting you a little gas!" and he gave her a friendly pat on the cheek and wheeled off.

John was remembering a more comfortable, for her recent condition was to make Tom in everything, when a driver tugged with all his might at the reins with no effect, and the one-occupant of the carriage, a lady, clinging to the side to save herself from being dashed out. It was she who had screamed, and a moment after John uttered a cry of terror, for a train came into view behind a green hillside, and rounded the hillside as if it approached the crossing.

"Tom—Tom!" cried John, pulling with quivering finger, "stop! they must! Oh, Tom!" and unable to make her machine in her position she slipped off and lay on the ground, sprawling, against her brother.

"If that fellow can turn the train on this way they're all right," said Tom shortly; "but if not—well—John, I must try to help that poor woman."

middle of the road, perfectly incapable of supporting her own weight while that horrible dream was being enacted before her. What could Tom expect to do? Even if he caught up with the train and how could he in that short time, with the mad-laden horse galloping like a stone? What could he do to stop them?

"He will only get killed along with them!" cried the girl, with her hands fast on the dark field and over, every nerve tense, and severely breathless, watching Tom's gallant race with death.

Down the hill he shot, past the confusion just staggering to his feet all dazed and shaken—down the hill with the speed of an express train as it of most earnest—

Lloyd Abbott's Friend.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JR.,
Author of "A Professor of Fifteen," "My Mysterious Father," etc.

CHAPTER I. DOWN IN THE BALANCE.

"It will be no harm to try it. If I can't get it I shan't be any worse off than I am at present."

Lloyd looked his nephew hastily while he was speaking and darted out the door after his remark.

"You won't get to town till nine," said sister Myra, called after him. "All to New York boys will have you so far ahead of you that my Uncle Remond's a darn will ere, forgotten, they ever admitted for a clerk."

"You are giving me a good deal off, at any rate," laughed Lloyd, as he clapped on his top and flung open the door, closed by."

"You'll be home to dinner, Lloyd?"

Mrs. Abbott ran out and sent the question after her son, and then the door swung shut.

"If I don't get the place," said Lloyd's answer. Then the door swung open and he was from a run for the station.

"When I will go out and take the edge off his disappointed hopes."

"You had sure that there is a chance of his getting the position?"

Mrs. Abbott looked at her daughter anxiously, she would like to have her only son do anything on which he did not set his heart, even if that was a thin straw, but which would take him away from her for days in the week.

"Just consider the man a cousin, mother, and you will understand for yourself Lloyd won't get to the shore till long before the school has been held, and even if he should it is time to be considered, he had no experience whatever in business."

"But he is certainly just in appearance, can speak German and even at home," said Mrs. Abbott. "When they find that that home is a wilderness, I'm afraid that they won't weigh much in his favor."

"Then you hope he won't get it, myra?"

"I haven't said that. You know enough that I am opposed to his leaving school this year."

"But he is such a proud spirited boy," interrupted the mother. "Just as his poor father. He cannot seem to feel that you are contributing to the support of the family, to his support, now that he is sixteen and over. It is hard enough for me to see him go out and face the world so young, but I can understand perfectly how he feels."

"Well," returned Myra, reflectively. "I suppose I had it hard to regard him in any other light than that of a little brother."

"He is taller than you now, Myra," interjected Mrs. Abbott.

"Yes, I know he is, and very proud of him I am and I like to work for him as well as for you."

"But that's just what Lloyd doesn't want you to do, and for my part I hope against hope that he'll get that place."

Lloyd, meanwhile, had just caught the express and was being whisked rapidly toward Hudson. There were a lot of people to know on the train, but he was rather shy of speaking to them.

He had been very considerate this fall, especially since, by going through the long tunnel one afternoon, he had opened that fall he had felt comfortable at the thought of Myra, singing in church on Sunday and giving lessons through the week in aid to the slender income which was all the family had to live upon since Mr. Abbott's death three years before.

Now the matter had come to a head. If people outside had begun to talk, it was high time he should act.

This was a week ago, when he had been in the city to buy a fall suit. Ever since he had watched the paper, on the lookout for a position. And this Saturday morning, when he was at liberty to go in and apply for it, I can go home and say I've got it."

He had long ago put away from him any ambition he may have cherished of keeping on at school long enough to fit himself for a profession or a position high up in the business world. The duty he owed to his mother and sister must be placed before everything else. Even now his cheeks burned as he recalled Dave Hard's remark.

But here he was at the station nearest to the Street & Carr store. He looked at his watch—a handsome gold one that had once belonged to his father. It was half past nine.

It was five minutes later before he reached the money and well appointed book store. Evidently the firm enjoyed a good class of custom. There were several ladies wearing handsome wraps standing about the counters, looking over Christmas cards, for the holiday season was well under way.

A slender faced young man, with a very small mustache, was talking to the clerk, and after waiting for an instant or two, Lloyd said to him:

"You advertised for a clerk in this morning's paper. Is this firm still out?"

"Just about, I should say. Please say—that, sir, in fifteen cents."

The young man turned his back on Lloyd, and immediately, but slowly at the call of duty.

For one moment Lloyd was minded to wheel about and walk out of the store. That would certainly have been the easiest thing for him to do.

But he lingered on, leaning back on a picture of "Chilly Chilly" in a dainty white and gold frame, thinking how he should like to be able to offer it to Myra for her Christmas. And to that instant something happened.

A door at the rear of the store opened and a portly gentleman, with a small, round, smiling face looked forth. He held a pair of gold rimmed spectacles in one hand, while the strong arm of his right hand was a sign of about Lloyd's age, who was with him.

Instantly Lloyd felt that this boy was the clerk who was "just about" engaged.

"Happy fellow," young Abbott remarked. "How glad he must feel!"

But somehow he did not look to be entirely at his ease. He was a slim fellow, wearing the latest shape in overcoat and with his hair plastered down smoothly from a part in the center.

But he was glancing about him nervously, as though watching for some possible evil to assail him. What this was specially made itself apparent.

"Calver," said the portly gentleman to the young clerk with whom Lloyd had exchanged his few words, "just hand me that last novel of Lindber's will you?"

Calver went over to the other side of the store, and soon came back with a book in his hand. Lloyd was interested in the proceedings, and under pretense of examining the book streetward Dave Hard in the end ahead of him ran to Ned Baker that it seemed pretty unusual in Lloyd Abbott to be down and be supported by his sister, didn't he think so. Lloyd didn't have Baker's reply because he got up at once and went into the next car at the risk of shaking himself with smoke and steam on the platform.

HE HOLDS THE LANTERN CLOSE TO THE BOY'S FACE AND PEEKS DOWN INTO IT, WITH A GLEAM, CRYING OUTTER OF SUSPICION IN HIS EYES.

But he was so choked by his own emotions that he could not for physical discomfort. Both Hard and Baker he regarded as among his best friends. They were all members of the athletic club, had grown up together in fact, and now—

But had Dave turned against him? Was it not the truth, what he had been saying?

Lloyd was glad that he could admit to himself that the chief element in the sensation he had experienced on overhearing the remark was not one of surprise. Ever since school he had chafed upon the advertisement of Street & Carr, waitresses and bookkeepers, who wanted "a young man as clerk, must be appearance, bring at home and with a knowledge of German."

The latter clause was what had especially tempted Lloyd with hope. He had been studying German for two years, and he felt that now he might reap practical benefit therefrom.

"If only they haven't engaged somebody already," he reflected.

When he reached New York, he pushed his way rapidly past the crowd and took an elevated train to town to Street & Carr's store.

"I wonder what salary they pay," he said to himself. "I must remember that car fare here and commutation on the railroad is going to mount up."

He smiled to himself as he realized the need of "a going."

"But won't it be a triumph for me

CHAPTER I. LOST ON THE GOLD COAST.

"Good by to the National! There she goes under full steam toward Europe, and not a soul on board dreams of my absence. It was a closely managed escape, if I must say it so. Will they miss the plank, I wonder? I hardly think so. 'Accidentally left overnight' will be the verdict when they find me missing in the morning. The passengers will be sorry—some of them at least—and they will be shocked when the whole story comes out, as it surely will at last."

"I am impatient for the departure of some black-skinned officer whom he boards the steamer with a pair of steel handcuffs in one fist, and a search warrant in the other. It was a rare bit of good luck that put that newspaper into my hands; otherwise I would have tumbled headlong into the trap."

"Well, there is no use in crying over spilt milk. I am dead to the world, as will be as soon as the news that the Argosy has been lost. The best life begins from this night, and I can't wait to make up my mind as to what I did of the old. Everything was against me at home, but here I am, under a fresh start, and now for the steamer that will carry me to Cape Coast."

Instantly on the speaker was of that moment, adding to the already having reason of the Chief of Police, the self-addressed words sounded slightly perfunctory. With one hand he clutched a long thick plank, and by repeated strokes of the other he kept his head and shoulders above the waves. His face was turned to the west, where against the horizon line of sky and sea the sloping ramparts and low, heavily built of a great steamer were clearly defined, while from their deck and lower masts the water with strong trails of ready light.

Overhead was the moaning wail of the sky, low drooping as though it would kiss the sea, and in its folds with that brilliant streaks of white and the deep blue. A mile or more to the north could be seen the black, forested hills of the coast of Africa.

There lay Africa, the vast and terrible continent which even at this advanced stage of the world's civilization stands so far off that its name and barbarism—a name that brings before one's mind the vision of ghastly men, tigers and rivers, of mad dogs and wild men, of burning villages, and millions of heads of black and white dropped in shades in the mist of human truth.

The solitary figure afloat on the lonely waste of water gave an evidence of being filled with reflections of the above nature. To him the African coast was merely a goal to be reached as speedily as possible; and with a last glance at the receding steamer he placed his hand on the edge of the plank, and by a vigorous use of legs and arms propelled himself toward a flickering mark of yellow light that was visible against the darkness of the shore.

He pulled on his arms slowly—for the plank broke into pieces—keeping his thoughts behind sealed lips, and waiting until the water, and a slight hand broke added to his efforts the occasional wail of the wind, and the sound of the waves. The last movement of the steamer was a help rather than a hindrance, and presently the swirling foam of the sea warned him that the critical part of the journey was close at hand.

He caught the glimmering stretch of the beach now, and the low hills that rose for an instant he was filled with fear; he suffered no longer in thought the great jaws were already tearing him apart from back. Then the instinct of self preservation woke him to quick action. He struck out vigorously with legs and arms, making a great splashing as possible. He scarcely hoped to escape his cruel pursuer, but he did not want a willing martyr to the plank into the rushing surf.

When it occurred an instant later with an impulse that rang in on the beach.

The momentum forced the fugitive's head, and the movement he lay on his back and then. Then a dash of spray forced him to further effort, and he crawled painfully in the shelter of a sand ridge that was well out of reach of the surf. He rested here for a little while, slowly regaining his breath and strength, and finally rose to his feet, revealing in the bright moonlight that was now flooding the beach the full, white figure of a man.

His face was a handsome one, and the round cheeks had not altered its slightly kindly expression. In spite of the water that trickled from his curly red hair and slight mustache, and the wet clothes that clung damply to his limbs, he had that air of calmness which proclaimed patience, firm and breeding, no matter how closely distressed.

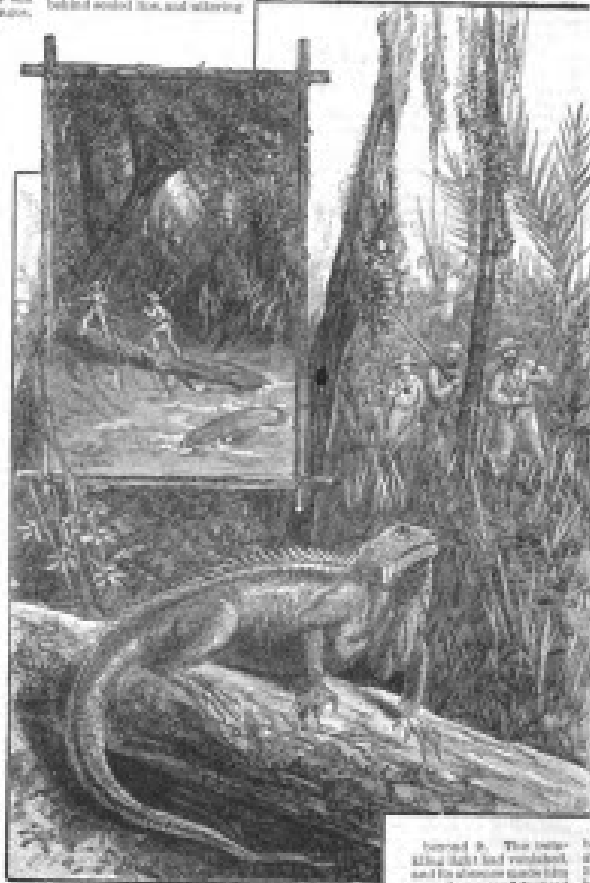

If his face could be taken as an index by which to read his character, it seemed wildly improbable that a man of such an air of calmness had forced him to abandon the steamer and seek refuge on the forested coast of Africa. Yet, what other motive could rule? If gratitude, who did he owe most of his life? His self spoken words contradicted him. He was undoubtedly a fugitive from justice.

He remained alternately the sea and the beach, and finally turned a reluctant face toward the island hills.

"No good luck!" he muttered. "I've made a mess of it somehow. At least tonight the Argosy was off Cape Three Peaks, and he that morning I could be in Cape Coast or Cape Coast Castle now. I don't know which way to turn. It's no joke to find one's self lost on the Gold Coast at night. Better that than a berth on the steamer, though. All things considered, I ought to count myself lucky. I must take one direction or the other, as I think I'll go west. There are more settlements that way."

He hesitated an instant, and then started inland along the beach, forward and backward. His sole consideration of a soft blanket shirt and those trousers, and as there were already beginning to dry, he felt no discomfort.

For an hour he tramped the wet sand, listening to the monotonous beat of the surf and standing his eyes widely for some sign of human habitation. Indeed, he saw no sign of human habitation, but as he went along he noted them, from time to time he was suddenly startled to see a dark form crouching between two rocks. It vanished instantly, leaving him uncertain whether it were man or beast.

"JUST AS WE WERE WITH GUARDS ON THE SHORE—DEAD! WE HEARD A SPLASHING SOUND!"

no word that might serve to pierce the memory of his crime.

From time to time he glanced sideways at the fading outlines of the steamer, as though regretting the mad impulse that had prompted him to exchange its shelter for the dubious mercy of the sea. The ward, until it was fairly caught in the slow, wailing sigh of the waves, and as he passed, he saw a last glimpse of the steamer, he saw a low black line protruding from the water less than ten yards away—a hungry shark in pursuit of a maid.

A Night of Terror.

BY CHARLES D. KENNEDY.

"But, I think there's something wrong about the night."

As Nick Johnson spoke he came to a halt, and turned to his companions with an anxious face.

"What makes you think so?" asked Dick Wilson, glancing toward apprehensively.

"I don't know. The feeling has been upon me for the last hour. Hark! What's that?"

The boys listened tensely, but could hear nothing.

"What's come over you?" said Dick. "There doesn't appear to be anything abnormal around."

"I'm sure I heard something," went on Nick, drawing back the hammer of his Winchester rifle, and straining his ears through the darkness.

It was too dark to see much, however, tonight of their seeing more than a dozen marks around them, for although the moon was full the sky was overcast and its light screened.

After listening a few minutes longer and not being able to hear anything Dick Wilson said:

"I reckon it's all right, Nick. You're a little nervous and only imagined you heard something. We haven't seen any Indians for more than a week now."

"I know that, but I reckon we'll see 'em before long. I'm sure I heard something."

He sat himself in motion again, and the others followed, but Nick held his gun ready for use, and kept his ears open for any further sound.

The boys were near on their way to Fortitude further north. They had been down to one of the main divisions of the American army, with some provisions and clothing, and could not find anything.

It was back in the stirring times of the struggle for independence, and these young patriots were doing all they could to assist the army in collecting provisions and clothing for the soldiers, and either delivering them in person or keeping them stored in a safe place for that purpose in the wilderness till some of the soldiers came for them.

The cabin now was full of provisions and other useful articles, while only that day the commanding officer of the division they had just started promised to send for the following morning.

The hut was built at the entrance of a deep ravine, and it was through this gorge the young patriots were making their way. They had just come in the vicinity of the hut when Nick spoke as above.

Pressing on now, they had almost reached the end of the cabin, when once more Nick heard the noise that had at first attracted his attention. He rushed eagerly like some cat rushing through the bushes, and he stopped again, staring in an undertone.

"Follows, I tell you there's something wrong. I just heard that noise again."

"So did I," said Len Wilson. "What-ever is it, it's about of us. Where it is, Nick, hear it."

There was no doubt about it this time.

Some one was making his way through the bushes, and they stretched their ears in the direction of the sound.

It continued for a few seconds, then ceased. It was probably an Indian, and he had passed close to where the boys stood.

Just then the clouds above began to break. In a few minutes the light of the moon shone through, and Dick Wilson, who advanced to look up toward the top of the ravine, started and then uttered a low cry.

The question of what was to be done now arose, but for some time they did not know how to act.

To allow the stranger to destroy or plunder the hut was not to be thought of, and this is what they would surely attempt to do unless prevented.

A few minutes' thought convinced Nick that the safest way would be to sneak around in the rear of the hut, and enter through the window, for once inside they felt they would be better able to repel the invaders.

By carefully picking their way they managed to pass the spot where the hut stood.

Still keeping in the shadow of the trees they reached a point close to the hut, and worked their way around to the rear without being seen.

The cabin stood in a small clearing, but there were some bushes here and there between the edge of the woods and the rear of the hut, and these helped them to reach the desired position.

Now at once proceeded to open the window, while Dick Wilson cautiously looked around the corner of the cabin toward the place where the three Indians were last seen. Near they were gone.

Dick continued to watch for some sign of them, and just as Nick succeeded in opening the window, he looked their shadowy forms crouching in the darkness near the entrance to the cabin.

"Hark, they're coming!" he whispered, and in a few seconds the young patriots were all in the cabin.

The window was quickly barred and the fastening of the door examined; then the young men stationed themselves at the door, and waited for the marauders to show themselves.

Time they did in a few minutes, and from the cautious manner in which they approached the cabin it was evident they intended serious mischief.

"Wait till they get close to the hut," said Nick, "then shoot over their heads."

"Better shoot at 'em," said Dick Wilson. "The red rascals, they've got no business here."

"So, don't harm 'em if we can help it," said Nick, decidedly. "Let's try to scare 'em away first."

In a short time the Indians were close to the cabin. It could be seen that each one carried a rifle, and the young patriots held their rifles ready as they watched them.

As soon as Nick thought they were near enough he was about giving the order to fire, when Len Wilson almost a sudden cry of fear.

"There's more of 'em," he said, in great alarm. "I reckon we've made a big mistake in coming here this night."

The boys quickly looked through the bushes, and sure enough other Indians came out of the darkness, and stood behind the first.

Nick began to be seriously alarmed now and was tempted to fire at them just out of pure spite. Before doing this, however, he decided to hurry out his first idea, and give the order to shoot.

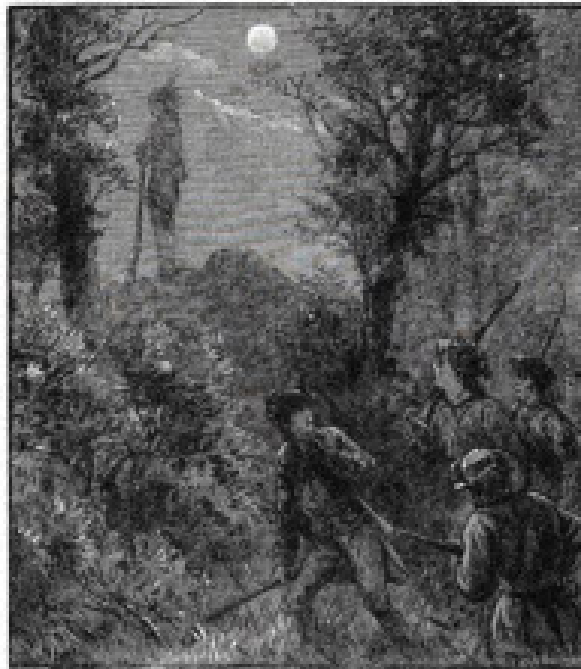

"Fire at 'em! do the thing, and the others follow!" he said.

The next instant the rifles cracked, and a host of men were driven by the Indians.

Quickly getting behind the nearest trees, they began shooting at the cabin. It was plain they were not to be so easily frightened as Nick had imagined, and that they would not desert until they had plundered the hut.

For some time they continued to shoot at the cabin all arounds, and once a volley burst from whithering through one of the bushes to hurt itself in the logs near which Dick Wilson was standing.

"I'll fix you for that, you red head."

THE BOYS LISTENED THEIR EYES AND NOSE AN INDIAN WARRIOR STANDING ON THE BRANCH OF THE BUSH.

"Look there," he whispered.

The boys lifted their eyes, and looked an Indian warrior, standing on the summit of the ravine. He was leaning on the outside of his rifle, and his face was turned toward the cabin.

Nick held up his hand warningly. "I was sure of it. There are others near. We must look out for ourselves," he said.

The boys crouched back in the shadow of the trees, and watched the cabin closely. In a moment two more Indians came into view, and all stood quiet toward the hut.

The cabin was in plain view of the ravine, from where they stood, and the young patriots knew they were waiting for an attack.

"We must get into the cabin as quick as we can," he said. "They'll try to get the hut on fire in a few minutes, and we'll have a better chance to resist 'em by shooting at them through a loophole."

"It seems we could shoot them down now for that matter, but I don't like to hurt 'em if it can be avoided, and a shot or two from the cabin may frighten 'em off. Besides there may be others."

"We can't get in the hut without their seeing us," said Dick Wilson, decidedly.

"Yes, we can. Come on and be careful."

Without the least noise Dick led the way, the others close behind. They were careful to keep behind the trees, and so avoid all places where the light of the moon shone bright.

CHAPTER I. THE HINTER.

Among the passengers landed from the steamer College Club, of the New York and Portland line, one bright August morning, was a tall boy, with a look of genuine carelessness on his tanned and sunburnt face.

He wore a suit of army cloth of decidedly country make, and his whole appearance indicated that he was born and reared in the rural districts.

The boat should have been at her pier the previous evening, but on account of a fog there had been a serious delay so that it was quarter-past eight in the morning when it reached the wharf.

Most of the passengers took breakfast on board, but Wren Winter, though he looked hungry did not avail himself of the chance to fortify himself with food for the probably fatiguing experience of a first day in the great metropolitan city of which he had dreamed so often.

Of the passengers who sat down to breakfast and were given a thorough to the inside by the man regarding the table with a longing look. That is, not at first.

But finally a stout, good natured looking young man, a drummer for a New York house who had been travelling in Maine and New Hampshire, chanced to look up, and noticed the boy's uncommenced appeal.

"I say, sonny, why don't you take some breakfast?" he said.

"It's fifty cents, isn't it?" said Wren.

"I don't afford it."

"Did you eat any meals aboard yesterday?"

"No, sir."

"You don't mean to say you haven't eaten since we left Portland?"

"Yes, sir, I ate; but not at the table."

"What did you eat?"

"I bought two cents worth of doughnuts before I left Portland."

"Gosh! I don't think I could get along on that."

"No, sir, I s'pose not, but I know I couldn't afford anything better."

The drummer allowed himself to be swayed by a benevolent impulse.

"Then, take this meal by me, sonny," he said. "You shall have a good breakfast if I have to pay for it myself."

Wren's face lighted up with joyful surprise.

"You're not, joking, are you, sir?" he said with somewhat doubt.

"That's a lot of it. I'm going to fill you up, sonny, and you shall tell me your story while you are eating."

Before he had fairly got out the words Wren took to the table.

"I'm awfully hungry," he admitted.

"You didn't find doughnuts a very sustaining diet I fancy," said the drummer, with an amused laugh.

"No, sir. They filled me up, but somehow they didn't satisfy me."

WREN WINTER FORWARDED AND GRABBED HIM BY THE MAN.

The House in the Woods.

BY HARRINGTON STARR.

"Is Master Beak there?"

Twice FANNON who had walked down the driveway leading to the main portal of the Plimsbury Academy, addressed his question to a group of three youths who were grouped about one of the old oaks which commanded the entrance to the academy grounds.

The huge trees, which were even older than the academy building themselves, cast such a heavy shadow that, although the sun had but shortly disappeared, the forms of the several groups of students on the front campus were but faintly outlined.

"No, sir, haven't seen him since his very class," promptly responded Cato Thorne, who reclined lazily against the "tail" of the mansion carriage.

"If you see him, Master Thorne, or any of you, please tell him that he is wanted in Dr. Alcock's study immediately."

"Where? wonder what his business is to now?" demanded Cato, under his breath, as the tutor turned away.

"That fellow's always in a scrape," "Never him, only right, too," remarked Charlie Egerton sharply.

"Hush, my child!" suspended Cato, with all the dignity of two years of seniority. "The poor chap is not in much trouble that we ought not to wish him any more punishment."

"I saw him making for the woods just after class," remarked Beverly Knight, the third member of the group, and who stood leaning against the trunk of the old oaken. "Seems to me he has been spending a good deal of his time over in that direction for a fortnight past."

"I wonder what mischief he's up to over there?" said Charlie. "That's what it is, I'll bet."

"Now, now, now!" remonstrated Cato. "Don't get in a snarl over it. The fellow isn't really worth that."

"Well, I have a hunch," guessed Charlie quietly.

"You say you saw him making for the woods?" observed Cato, turning to young Knight. "Let's walk down that way and, if we see him, hurry him up. If he's been into something and the Doc is going to take him up for it, the Government won't be any lighter because he has to wait for the poor fellow."

"I won't go!" declared Charlie, with gravity. "He won't get a bit more than he deserves."

"Oh, you say well, Charlie," rejoined Cato, jumping up, and both he and Beverly rushed upon their friend and bore him, struggling and laughing, from his perch on the oaken, finally setting him upright in the center of the road which ran past the school premises.

Then they gripped the reluctant boy beneath his arms and started off at such a pace that Charlie really had to exert himself to "keep up with the procession."

"Come, fellows, let up and I'll go along peacefully," he said at length.

"What do you suppose I can do against the Plimsbury Academy hall guard and the walk and rooster?"

"Nothing at all, my man," replied Cato. "We come on and behave yourselves. Now, one, two—three, four—halt."

right! That's it, and into the swing and see if we can make the crossroads in twenty minutes!"

The boys waving along the country road after that for several minutes to silence, the shadows slowly growing deeper about them, as the light gradually faded from the sky. From the edge of the wood, which lined the road on the eastern side, was reached, its shadows looking deep and forbidding.

"What under the sun did Beak dare to do over here I can't see," remarked Charlie, his words showing upon what subject his thoughts were still fixed.

Cato said, good naturedly. "He's probably studying natural history out here in the woods. What he does won't harm you."

Charlie smiled readily, but went on as far as the crossroads in silence.

"Don't," exclaimed Cato, stopping his watch, as they reached the spot, "and a minute to spare. That was a good two mile pace."

"But we haven't seen a sign of Beak," said Beverly, throwing himself flat upon a low bank.

"Let's go on to the old house," proposed Charlie, whose blood was now up.

that isn't the moon," declared Charlie dogmatically. "It's in the old house—in the kitchen, for I can see it shining through the window."

"The key is right," said Cato patronizingly, much to Charlie's disgust.

"Perhaps some tramp has set the old place on fire," suggested Bev, as he broke free a run toward the town-house, building which had long stood unoccupied in the middle of the wood.

In a minute they had plunged through the wood grown rail and burst in at the kitchen door.

"Why, it's a fire in the stove," said

"IS MASTER BEAK THERE?"

Beak, as the reader will suspect, was not a general favorite at Plimsbury Academy. For his antecedents were very doubtful indeed, and his looks and language were bad, and he was the school bully.

Even Cato Thorne, who was the best natured fellow in the world, had been forced into a quarrel with him; but he promptly settled it by hitting Beak, and warning him, too, most decidedly.

Naturally Beak did not try to find further cause for disagreement between himself and Thorne, and Cato was too good natured to lay up such a thing against anybody.

Whatever secret rivalry the bully may have felt towards his conqueror he was careful to keep hidden, and they always got along well, but Charlie Egerton, who was a dirty, suspicious little fellow in power, saw Cato called him, was always at loggerheads with Beak.

"Don't you worry about Beak,"

"I'm with you; and, Bev, get up off that ground. Great Scott, but don't you know that we've got to play the Academy a week from tomorrow? Want to get down sick with the malaria, or rheumatism, or something?"

demanded Cato, who, as captain of the football crew, was most careful of his men. "We depend upon you and men to win the game for us."

Bev sprang up with a grunt, but set the pace himself as they turned off the highway into the narrow crossroad which here entered the thick woods.

"Right ahead," said Charlie, some minutes later.

"The moon, you goose!" responded Cato. "Horrish! It's going to be all right, too, in about an hour. When we get to the old house here just a while and then tramp back by moonlight."

"Agreed," said Bev, still keeping up his steady tramp.

"I tell you there's a light ahead

Charlie. Somebody must be about, here. What the devil, Bev, and let's look around."

"I didn't know the old stove would burn," remarked Cato. "See, mama-beak's been packing up the pipe. Wonder who things will here?"

"We may find out to our sorrow, if he happens to be ill secured," retorted the smiling Beverly. "Come, Charlie, let these boys alone. They belong to some tramp, man! Stop!"

"Hush, eh?" said Charlie, who was investigating a heap of rubbish in the corner. "There's a mighty good coat and vest, and—oh, what's this?"

Somewhere fell out of the clothing and landed upon the floor, Cato watched it up, and by the bright light which shined and flickered on the floor and broken walls, examined the object.

"Well, I swear!" he exclaimed. Cato was somewhat attracted to the use of strange and barbarous expressions. "Look at this."

Trials and Triumphs OF A YOUNG REPORTER.

BY EARLE E. MARTIN.

CHAPTER I. IN THE SANCTUM.

"Here here!" exclaimed Bob White, as he threw down the newspaper he had been reading, and glanced upon his companion.

"Well," asked the other, "I will never do for you to slander lawyers, Grant Dudley! You know as well as I do that few things compare with the law. As for the newspaper business, you ought not to mention the two in the same breath."

The young fellow who sat in the chair in the farther corner of the office, laughed at this declaration. White and he were good friends; and he had learned to make allowance for some of his companion's assertions.

"I shall take two breaks," he replied. "Heads! White, you lawyers are amazing. For instance—"

"Some of your instances?" retorted Bob White, who was beginning to be a trifle ruffled at the nature of his companion's remarks.

"If you please," laughed Grant Dudley, "the court will rule out all instances. But as I was saying, how you are enough to make one laugh."

"No you say?"

"Suppose a trial is held over a horse. One lawyer proves that since a horse is a quadruped, and a man is a man, therefore a horse is a man. His opponent will then prove that a horse is not a quadruped, but a beast of burden, and thus a man is a beast of burden, a horse is a man!"

"The newspaper man would say the horse is a man, without so much as trying to prove it," retorted Bob White. "But I say, you are trying to lampoon—"

"No, I am not," answered Grant, as he leaned back in his chair's easy chair. "Only a few minutes ago two were printing newspaper men at a great rate; and I merely wanted to show you that other people besides lawyers are important."

"I'll admit that we're all important," interrupted White, who secretly was that he had been getting diverted by the worst of the argument.

"If you are willing to admit that journalism is as good a profession as law, I'll admit that law is as good as journalism."

"Come," answered Bob White, and he picked up his newspaper from the floor. "Heads! I was half in jest in what I said about newspapers."

"And I assure you that I hold no grudge against lawyers in general and you in particular."

Peace was once more restored between the two friends, whose fire for their chosen line of work had led them into more than one heated discussion.

"If you will wait until I have finished this paragraph," suggested Grant Dudley, "I will go over to Mr. McFarlane's with you, and we will talk over that evening story work you suggested."

"All right," assented the young student of law, and he once more buried himself in his newspaper.

Grant Dudley reached out to a book shelf at his side, and drew down a copy of the law, in which he proceeded to turn up some reference in the subject he was discussing on paper.

Ten minutes before the young lawyer and the young editor had been warmly debating their life's calling. The lawyer was now leaning back in his chair, and the current of the printing press was sweeping rapidly through the pages of a law book.

Bob White looked out of the windows once or twice at the falling rain.

here he was, but assistant to Mr. Philip Street, proprietor of the Times Tribune.

But the reality was not entirely rose colored. For instance, on this particular day, few things had gone right in the office of "The Tribune."

Early in the morning Mr. Street had called hurriedly out of the morning, without drawing as much as a word as to his intentions, and he had not returned. It was now past three o'clock in the afternoon.

The news columns were remarkably innocent of what should be their chief feature, considering that this was the last day before the paper went to

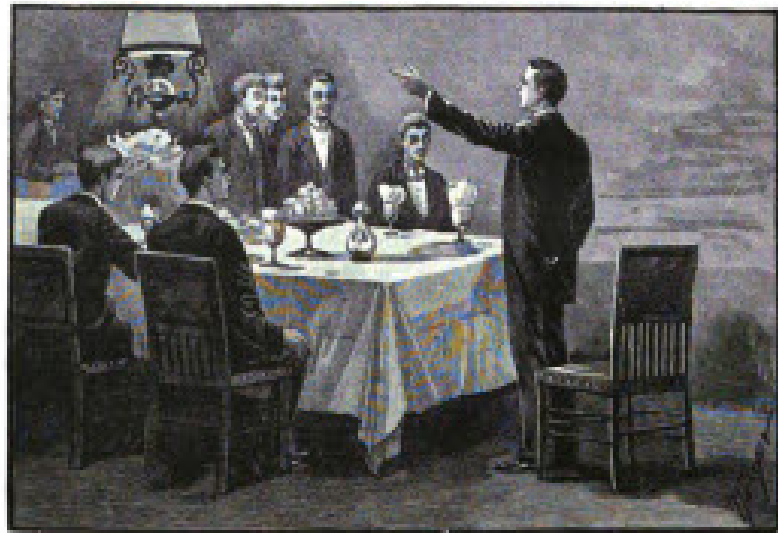

"Oh, most anything. Try some story on 'law versus journalism,'" drawled White, with a twinkle of the eye.

"Good," responded the young journalist. "The very thing!"

With these words, Grant Dudley went at his task with a new spirit. He was determined to finish his work, and go out with White before it should be time for him to examine the final page proof sheets of "The Tribune."

"The field of law and the field of letters," he began to write.

But before he had started his first sentence, the door which led into the composing room was opened, and a

HE HESITATED TO USE HIMSELF AS HE HAD USED UP BEFORE HIS CLAMORING AND RESPONDED TO THE TOAST: "THE PRESS."

"Will it never cease?" he asked himself, and then turned again to his reading.

Grant Dudley wrote down a few sentences on the yellow paper before him. Then he leaned back in his chair.

For some unaccountable reason, his thoughts did not seem to come with any degree of ease. That is to say, the thoughts came easy enough, but they were not the thoughts he wanted to call forth and send to the work in hand. It seemed impossible to master his mind on the present.

In doubt on his work all right, but in a way that did him no practical good. He seemed to see himself in imagination as he had stood up before his schoolmates at their graduation the previous June and responded to the toast "The Press."

"They all know his great ambition was to be an editor, but then it had appeared to him like a dream that would never be more than that. And press. Added to this, Mr. Street had had some trouble with an advertiser, who had withdrawn his regular half column notice.

This unexpected event, coming early in the afternoon, had left Grant Dudley with another vacancy to fill, another seven hundred words to write; and as he was a boy who did his literary work in a conscientious manner, seven hundred words, coming at the end of a hard week and a hard half day, meant a good deal of brain cogging.

"Where was Mr. Street, by?" he pondered. "I have to go to press without his being here, but I will have to be done if he doesn't return soon. The little paper should be looked in the form by this time. It's too bad that death should have taken out his aid just at this time. What shall I do that space with?"

"What can I write an interesting half column about, White?" he suddenly asked his friend.

small and bony figure appeared on the threshold.

"Say, Mr. Dudley, Mr. Brown, he wants to know when you look for Mr. Street back, and he says he's got to be in a whoppy big hurry, or it's gone to be right here pretty soon," said the apartment.

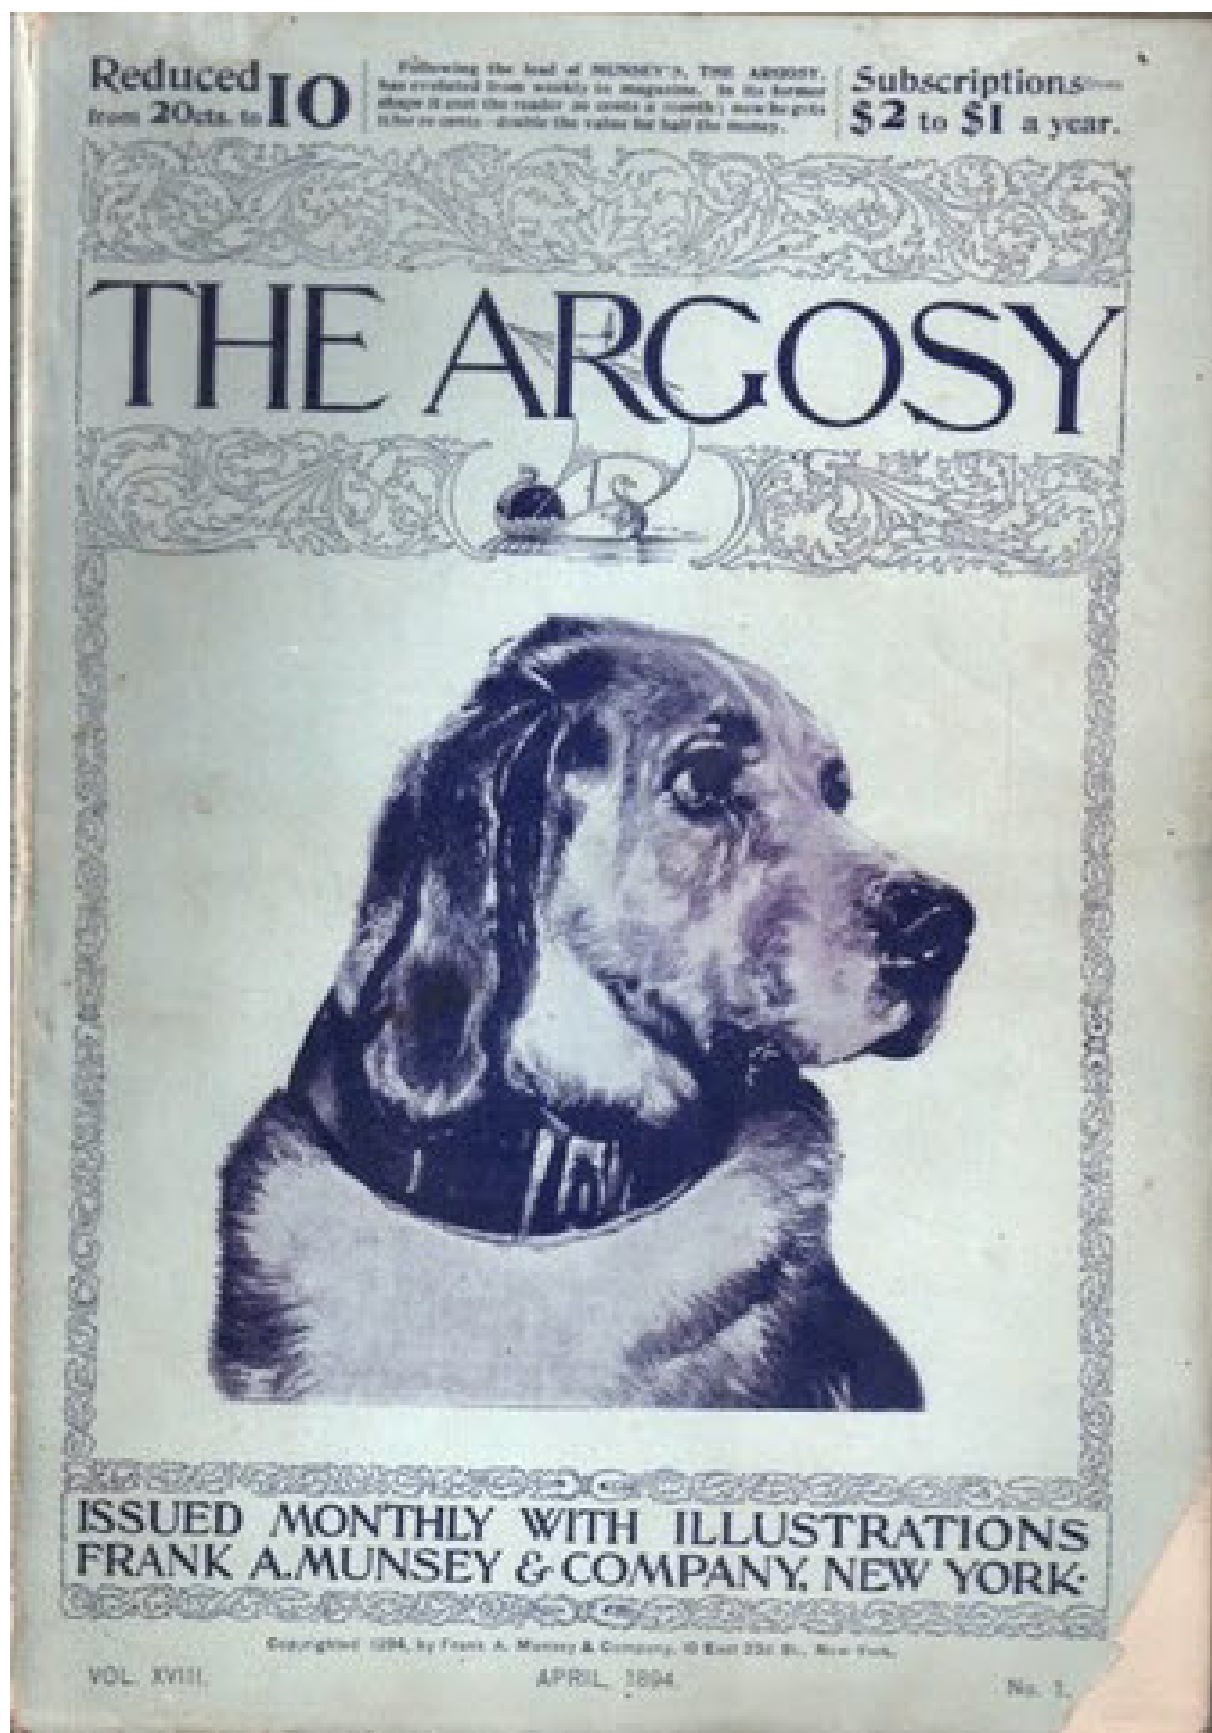

"All right, Jim, tell Mr. Brown I'll be out in two or three minutes."

The door closed behind Jim, the office devil, and Dudley again dashed away at his half column task.

When he had written about three hundred words, he switched on the writing lamp, intending to finish the article later; then he followed the apprentice into the printing room.

Motion was in confusion in the composing room as well as in the editorial office. Several galloping of type were making their fare at the make up stand, although Brown the foreman was working diligently away, placing the display headlines in their proper positions, and arranging and

THE ARGOSY

FOR NOVEMBER

THE ARGOSY is growing every month in circulation. A publication never grows in circulation without cause. The cause of the present growth with The Argosy is merit, and nothing but merit. It contains nothing but stories. The Argosy just suits a very large class of readers. It gives them what they want. Its stories are strong and vigorous—full of adventure and rapid action.

The Argosy is the biggest magazine published, 188 pages. It gives more rattling good fiction for ten cents than ten cents can buy anywhere else in the world.

The Argosy Again On Weekly Schedule

With this issue, The Argosy gets back to its own—gets back to weekly publication. I started The Argosy December 2, 1882, as a weekly paper, and continued it as a weekly twelve years. Then I changed it over in 1894 to a monthly in response to the demands of that day. In monthly publication it has had a conspicuously successful run of twenty-three years. Now it returns to the weekly field in response to the demand of to-day for weekly issues of fiction publications instead of monthly issues.

ABOUT:

Light blue text indicates key (subjective) and/or frequent contributor.

Clicking on a page number will go to the first page.

Clicking on a section header will go to the TOC.

Clicking on a cover thumbnail will go to the content desc for the issue.

Clicking on a cover image in the content desc will go to the full page image, and vice-versa.

Green text indicates links to external URLs:

HathiTrust, Internet Archive, Luminist Archive, Heritage Auctions, ABE.

Story titles in green link to the story's page in the issue on Internet Archive.

Some links may be off by a page or two after a certain point in the issue due to missing or combined pages.

Listings from HA and ABE may be out of date and/or obsolete.

Use green HA or ABE links in Contents section too search for current listings.

Much of the TOC content for this PDF was derived from Phil Stephensen-Payne's awesome
